Third. Most important of all, however, was the utterance of the governor himself, who, in an admirable little address, setting forth the objects of the conference, made this significant remark, "Back of the vice question is the wage question. Most women become immoral through financial pressure."

The average comfortable and respectable church-goer does not realize how bitterly true this is.

A Y. W. C. A. worker in addressing a meeting of the Daughters of the King said recently only about two-thirds of the working girls in Richmond, Va., received a living wage, that most of them lived at home and their wages were just pin money, or went to supplement the family purse.

Here again our churches should use their influence and go to the bottom of this great evil by agitating for investigations and surveys that will show clearly what a living wage is, and then to require employers to pay it.

When the government needed a great production of wheat it fixed a minimum price per bushel in order to secure it.

Surely we need a working womanhood that is safe guarded by a fair living wage from the temptation to supplement a pittance that does not afford her a living, by selling even her own soul to eke out what she should be entitled to by law, just as much as the producer of wheat is entitled to a minimum price to protect him from an over-supply market.

If social workers, and philanthropic persons who work so hard to secure and keep up cheap boarding places for working girls would devote more of their energy to securing just compensation for those girls they would be rendering a vastly greater service.

Now is the time to focus public attention upon this problem, when it is not only a question of economic justice and public morality, but of the physical well being of the young men in our cantonments who are going out to lay down their lives, if necessary, that we may have life, and have it more abundantly.

First Sunday After Trinity: That Trinity season is not intended to be a sort of go-as-you-please for lectionary purposes, or even devoted to "duty" after a course on "doctrine," is quite apparent, with the Eucharistic services for our guide, if we take note of the fact that whereas Whitsunday is a commemoration of the gift of the Holy Spirit, that is followed, on Trinity Sunday, by the necessity of being born anew by the Spirit, and that in turn by the definition of the regenerate life as one of love, on the first Sunday after Trinity (Epistle). Hence it is that the present Prayer Book Lectionary plan of undertaking to give from Trinity Sunday on an outline of the Old Testament, rests on no sound basis. Although particular lessons here and there may turn out to be topically suitable, the whole raison d'être of the use of the Old Testament, viz., the record of a religious experience which is "fulfilled" in the New, as a rosebud enclosed in its calyx and which flowers in the full blown rose, is practically lost, through the failure to connect the great redemptive facts of the first covenant with their anti-types in the new. Nor should we overlook the fact that even geography, as well as history, has a spiritual meaning in the Old Testament. Egypt, the Wilderness, the Promised Land, Babylon, these are types of spiritual experience. It is for that reason that the New Lectionary devotes Trinity season of year II (so far as the Old Testament history is concerned) to the experiences of God's redeemed people after their return from exile, a people who have sinned, been punished and then forgiven and restored.

The continuation of our Old Testament historical course brings us on this Sunday to a practical obedience (after the re-covenanting of last Sunday) to the laws of God which had been given through Moses; especially a separating of the people who "had knowledge and understanding" from outsiders; no intermarriage with non-Israelites; strict observance of the Sabbath and of land and debt laws; provision for the worship of Almighty God; and so on. The student of Old Testament history, nay, of religion, should "stick a pin" here. This was the beginning of Pharisaism, that is, of "separatism"; of that Old Testament Puritanism, which preserved all that was good in Judaism and also crucified the Lord! Topically, no selection could be more appropriate in connection with thought of the Collect for the day, viz., "evangelical" obedience. The old Testament alternative is one of the many prophecies fulfilled after the return; and the New Testament lesson is St. Paul's appeal for evangelical obedience, the obedience of love which responds to God's grace exhibited in redemption. As the word "therefore" (Rom. 1:1) harks back to the redemption expounded in preceding chapters, so did the past experiences of Israel returned urge obedience on the redeemed. Moreover, the separation from the world and the fellowship with each other that characterized the people in Nehemiah's time, are urged by the Apostle under the head of not being conformed unto this world and not thinking of ourselves more highly than we ought to, but as being members one of another. The evening lessons, selected with reference to the same leading thought, give us, the blessings of obedience from the standpoint of Old Testament wisdom and (second lesson) its necessity for eternal life; but that obedience which consists in following Christ (perhaps selection should end with 30).

O God, the strength of all those who put their trust in Thee: Mercifully accept our prayers; and because, through the weakness of our mortal nature, we can do no good thing without Thee, grant us the help of Thy grace, that in keeping Thy commandments we may please Thee both in will and deed; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Note: Christ desired at this time to correct any misunderstanding about Himself, and show the need for confession of and definite ideas about Him. (Rhees p. 141.) Christ kept His promise to St. Peter in John 1:42. See also Eph. 2:20, 21 (Caley p. 107.) Read references in the Bible from a concordance, or the margin of the Bible to the words ROCK and STONE. Christ recognized His disciples rebuke as Satan's suggestion. He also explained the nature of real discipleship. He had a purpose in ascending the Transfiguration Mount (Luke 9:28): and while there showed the three disciples the glory of His Deity. Lesson VI in the Teacher Training Course.

The Power of God.

There is one power of help in the world worth while—the power of God—and that power of help is there for the asking. He must have a callous, careless soul who can pass through times like these and not hear a voice whose call a man must answer, or else lose his soul. And that voice is the Voice of God challenging us to prove Him faithful in His promise to help. Your country needs you for prayer for this help. The Kingdom of God on earth needs you for prayer. The cause of Christ is hard beset and righteousness is having a heavy battle in the earth—they need you for prayer for the help of God. What are you doing for the cause of righteousness? Giving? Yes. Working for Red Cross and other patriotic objects? Yes. Possibly all this, but it is a spiritual fight in which we are engaged, and spiritual powers are absolutely necessary. Are you making use of the spiritual help that is of God? Do you desire it and are you doing all you can to lay hold of it for the cause? These are pertinent questions with which the coming crisis challenges us, and which demand an honest answer. As the Bishop of Huron in his Lenten Pastoral says: "Those agencies which men trusted as sufficient to support society and ensure progress have hopelessly broken down, and we are once more thrown back upon the Eternal God as our refuge and strength. Are we learning that lesson? Where God is ignored, all else will go wrong." From Lenten Letter, Rev. C. E. Jenkins, Brantford, Ont.

I Will Not Fear.

"There is no fear in love."

N. B. T.

For Love's dear sake I will not be afraid,
Though earth is full of trouble and of strife;

In Love's good name I follow unafraid
Along my road of life.

Sorrow must fall, because the way is long,

Storms must arise and weariness endure,
But to the end loving, I shall be strong,
Loved, I shall be secure.

The face of grief will alter when we meet

Because my spirit shrinks not, still serene;

The waters shall divide before my feet
And let me walk between.

My heart is safe. Though arrows fly above,

Though pain and foe and pestilence be near—

Beneath Thy fending wings, O perfect Love,

What place hath fear?

The Angle of Vision.

Mary Nelson Talbot.

Edith Morse and Juliet Blair were in the thick of an animated discussion among the rose bushes. The argument waxed so warm, indeed, that the beauty of creamy clusters and deep pink sprays was almost lost to them. Likewise the work of cutting flowers for Nora Lester's wedding languished.

The subject in hand was a somewhat absurd one when viewed by an outsider, but apparently it had gained weight with discussion, for both speakers were much in earnest—Edith lazily persistent in maintaining her point and Juliet beginning to be a little testy. They had disagreed as to a certain look about Molly Hume. They had not known Molly Hume very long, but she seemed as well worth talking over, this warm morning, as any one else. Edith contended that the odd look about her eyes was the sure outward sign of an inward discontent. "I've heard somewhere," she said, "that Molly is chronically cross. To be sure, she doesn't seem so in company, but that is no proof."

Juliet was equally certain that the look was an affectation. "She has the reputation of being literary, you know," she argued, "and that's the regular bookworm squint."

Edith laughed, as she always did at Judith's vivid definitions, but she remained obstinate. When she made a point she always held it fast—good-naturedly, but securely.

The conversation grew more and more heated, until at length Edith became a little tired. "These shears don't cut at all," she declared. "I'm going to run over and borrow Miss Jane Holt's for a while," and forthwith she went.

Miss Jane came out with her sleeves rolled high and her ruddy face more than usually flushed. "Just about to start on the parlor in my June house-cleaning," she said, leading the way into the dim, high-pitched room. "You know, Mary Lee and I take it by turns, and this is my month. Certainly you are welcome to the shears; sit down." She drew forward a rocker. "I keep the parlor dark," she went on, in a tone of apology, "because of the pictures."

"The pictures?" Edith's voice held a puzzled interrogation.

Miss Jane crossed to the window with determined tread and threw open a shutter. "Look at them," she said. "Don't you see something wrong?"

The visitor's glance swept the walls. Certainly there was something amiss. The two engravings over the sofa and the half dozen Holt portraits had a topsy-turvy look. Even old Judge Holt, Miss Jane's great-grandfather, was tilted at a rakish angle. "Why, they've all slipped to one side," she said.

Miss Jane closed the blind with a snap. "They have not slipped," she said. "I wish they had. It's Mary Lee's doings. She can't hang or set an object straight to save her life, no matter how I try to train her. I'm just and fair. May is her month, so through May the pictures all hang wrong. But I'm glad when my month comes around. I would call it obstinacy in Mary Lee if I didn't know it was really a physical affliction—the 'crooked eye,' so-called. Came down to us through the Dabneys. You have to make allowances for a thing like that, but it's mighty provoking, all the same."

When Edith left the shutters had been flung wide, and a backward glance showed Miss Jane hurrying briskly from corner to corner, her arms upraised. She speculated idly on the discomfort of having to spend every other month under such a nervous strain. "I'd take Miss Mary Lee to an oculist," she decided, a little amused at the thought.

At her own gate she met Juliet. "I'll be back in a few minutes," the latter explained. Her manner was still somewhat stiff. "I thought I'd take a little recess and see what Miss Mary Lee wants with me; she sent me word by Nora to run down there when I could. Nora's in the garden, now. Hurry up, don't let her cut her own wedding flowers."

Gentle little Miss Mary Lee drew her visitor into the dining-room. "Jane's cleaning the parlor," she said. "My dear—" She pitched her soft tones even lower. "What I wanted with you is this. I believe Nora intends to run in here for good-bye after the ceremony—you know I never go to weddings—and I'm almost sure some of her friends from a distance will be with her if she does. Now, can't you ward her off in some way?" The confiding eyes grew a little moist. "That sounds dreadful, I know. I'll have to explain, Juliet, it's the pictures. I don't know whether you ever noticed, but there are times when they all hang wrong."

Juliet looked about her. "I notice it now," she said, bluntly. "What's the matter with them?"

"Nothing's the matter with them," Miss Mary Lee answered, with delicate emphasis on the pronoun. "The trouble lies with Jane. Her voice sank to a whisper. "My dear, all through the months that follow her house-cleanings the pictures have to stay this way. She can't see at all that anything is wrong. It's the Holt defect of vision that she inherited, poor dear. You understand why I'd rather not have Nora's stranger-friends coming in just now . . . with Judge Holt entirely askew, and our great uncle, who was an ambassador, twisted, as you see him here."

Juliet was indignant. "The idea of your not straightening the pictures!" she exclaimed. "Why, you shouldn't hesitate, Miss Mary Lee. Here, I'll do it myself—you can tell her—"

But the old lady put up a small, deprecating hand. "No, Juliet!" she cried, almost sharply. "I wouldn't have her to suspect for worlds, my dear!"

Juliet left still indignant, and when she joined Nora and Edith she had not cooled down. Forgetting entirely that Miss Holt's communication had been confidential, she began to air her grievance. "Did either of you ever notice that at times the Holt pictures are all hung wrong?" she asked.

Edith burst out laughing. So you ran in on that, too, did you?" she asked. "Poor Miss Jane!"

Juliet's bright blue eyes widened. "Poor Miss Jane!" she echoed. "I should say the shoe is on the other foot." She proceeded to relate the conversation.

A fresh argument ensued. When the two girls had talked at cross-purposes for a while, Edith picked up her flower basket with an air of dignity. "I may not be as intelligent as you, Juliet," she said, "but I have not entirely lost my mind. Twenty minutes ago I talked to Miss Jane in the parlor, and with my own eyes saw the pictures and the way they were hanging."

Juliet lost her temper outright. "And haven't I come straight, Edith Morse, from seeing Miss Mary Lee in the dining-room, where all her blessed old ancestors are standing on one ear, and she bemoaning it?"

Nora Lester broke in unexpectedly. "I don't mean any disrespect to the ancestors," she said, "but which ear?"

Juliet considered. "Why, the right," she decided, presently. "I'm sure of that, because the ambassador appeared to be listening down toward the horn of the graphophone."

This effectually restored Edith's good humor. "More mystery," she declared amid her laughter. "All the parlor pictures slanted to the left; that I remember positively. We may as well give it up. Juliet and I seem fated to fuss this morning anyhow. We've just had one squabble about Mollie Hume."

Nora's face was full of laughter as she lifted it from the heart of a red rose. "I'll be referee, girls," she offered. "It's this way. Both of the poor dears have the 'crooked eye,' and each puts it on the other and traces it to a different side of the house. If you'll notice, the pictures hang wrong all the year round—part of the time tipped one way, part of the time the other. Miss Jane bears it with proud dignity, Miss Mary Lee as a cross, patiently and with love. I admire them both for the way they take it."

The other two looked at each other with rueful laughter. Juliet extended her hand to Edith. "Shake," she said. "Surely we're square enough now, if we weren't first."

Nora's face shadowed a little. "What about Mollie Hume?" she inquired.

Edith explained, a little reluctantly. "I say that odd look is crabbedness," she ended. "Juliet calls it a bookworm squint." Somehow the funny phrase fell a little flat this time.

Nora stopped and picked up thoughtfully the fallen petals of the red rose. "It isn't either," she said, quietly. "Molly has incurable eye trouble. She never complains, but I've known it a long time. It's broken up all her studying, long ago. The doctors say she must simply let books alone for good and all."

Edith's fair face flushed crimson. "Oh, Nora!" was all she said.

There was a short silence, then Juliet spoke with an evident effort. "There's nothing square about us now," she said, "any way you look at it, Edith."

"We're as bad as Miss Jane and Miss Mary Lee," was Edith's shamefaced comment.

Juliet never minced matters. "In one way," she agreed. "We were looking at the same thing in different ways, and both ways wrong. But they weren't to blame—and we were, Edie, you know."

Nora turned on them sweet, candid eyes. "Molly's going to miss me," she said. "I wish you two would cultivate her. And now I'm going down to tell Miss Mary Lee good-bye before the wedding."

The three started away together.

"I'm sorry I forgot and told," Juliet said, "but I'm glad we didn't miss that lesson. You know, I never thought before how many different ways there may be of looking at the same thing."

"I never did, either," Edith supplemented, more inarticulate than her friend, but equally as penitent.

Nora was arranging a soft white cluster of blooms for Miss Mary Lee. "It's what mother's old minister used to call 'the angle of vision,'" she said. "I don't want to seem a preachy bride, but I've found out myself that in looking at life that angle makes all the difference in the world."

The Bird-Lady.

(A True Story.)

Deaconess May Shepperson.

The children called her "the bird-lady." I was just a little surprised when I met her, for the name indicated French descent. I had fancied a rather small person with the delicate features of her race. Instead, Mrs. Roby—that, of course, was not her real name—was very large, with a somewhat gruff voice. She gave me a warm welcome and seemed especially flattered to know that I had asked for her birds as soon as I heard of their existence.

"As many people come to see the birds as do to see me," she said with a little laugh. "In fact, I think the birds are the more popular."

She led the way into her kitchen, where she did all her own work, for she had only a tiny tenement flat. The cages were ranged around the walls. Every available place seemed to be filled and even some old deal tables had been pressed into the service. Such a chirping and chirruping of delight as we entered! I knew at once that the birds realized they were in good hands.

"I suppose you raise them for sale?" I queried.

"No, I do not."

Mrs. Roby looked at me reproachfully. She replied: "I dare say I am foolish not to sell some of them when there are so many, and I have such good offers for them, but you see, those birds are to me like so many children. I love each separate one. I send them visiting to children, to invalids and to people sick or in sorrow. They bear their own message."

We stepped to the window for a nearer view of the birds, and lo, not birds only filled Mrs. Roby's leisure! There were roses of every variety; the air was fragrant with them. At the end of the garden was a rockery filled with ferns and flowers. The walls of the garden were covered with vines, and a grass plot occupied the centre of the little city yard. Sparrows, dear little brown things, were hopping about and perching on every available space.

"The birds love the garden," said Mrs. Roby, "and I sometimes fancy that my birds inside enjoy looking at it from their cages in the window. That is why I change the places of the cages. I put some in the window today, others tomorrow, so that all may have the same chance."

"What do you do with the flowers?" I asked.

"Oh, they go to poor people just as the birds do. I have a great habit of 'slipping'—that is, cutting—new plants from the old ones, for that means the beginning of another garden somewhere, even though it is only a window box. We need beautiful things like flowers in life. Didn't God start man in a garden? Didn't our Lord Himself find His Father's heart and the ministering angels in a garden?" The large dark eyes were moist. "I think," she added, "God means us to plant gardens for His weary children, don't you? And if they will only help a bit with the planting themselves, so much the better. That is why I send flowers to the hospital or to a home by some one whose own heart is breaking. Of course, I've no time to take them myself. Help make a garden for some one else, out of your sorrow, I say, and it is wonderful how glad most people are to do it. It is wonderful, too, how much comfort they find in that way for themselves."

Favorite Hymns.

When I Survey the Wondrous Cross.

When I survey the wondrous cross
On which the Prince of Glory died,
My richest gain I count but loss,
And pour contempt on all my pride.

Forbid it, Lord, that I should boast.
Save in the cross of Christ, my God:
All the vain things that charm me most,
I sacrifice them to His blood.

See, from His head, His hands, His feet,
Sorrow and love flow mingled down!
Did e'er such love and sorrow meet?
Or thorns compose so rich a crown?

Were the whole realm of nature mine,
That were a tribute far too small;
Love so amazing, so divine,
Demands my soul, my life, my all.

The above words, known and sung wherever the English tongue is set to music, were written by the great hymnologist, Isaac Watts. Its sweet, meditative tone is in keeping with many other of the hundreds of sacred songs that he gave to the world. Watts was born about two and a half centuries ago, the son of a sturdy Nonconformist minister who twice suffered imprisonment for his convictions. The hymn writer is recorded as a man of great piety, gentleness and learning. His philosophical and theological books were widely read, and the bulk of his well-known work, "Hymns and Spiritual Songs," was completed before he was twenty-three. Over-application to study early brought on a long and weary illness from which he never recovered. He died in 1748. His remains rest in an humble English village, but a memorial to his fame may be found in Westminster Abbey, and many of his hymns will scarcely be forgotten while time lasts.

A peculiar significance attaches to this hymn at the present day. It is reported to us as one of the two hymns (the other being "Abide With Me") that are best loved and oftentimes sung by the allied soldiers at the front. Chaplain, in his book, "The Soul of a Soldier," tells us: "There is nothing written by the hand of man which can compete with these two hymns in the blessing and strength which they have brought to our soldiers, especially during an offensive when death has cast his shadow over the hearts of all. During the bitterest weeks in the Somme fighting there was scarcely a service in which we did not sing 'When I Survey the Wondrous Cross.' With its assurance of redemption it gave comfort in the face of death. It also gave, for an example, the Supreme Sacrifice."

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

A Few Kitchen Hints.

In these days of imperative thrift the conscientious housewife will consider no piece of economy too insignificant for her to practice. Our first year of war has been rich in the discovery of thrifty expedients that no one ever dreamed of in more prosperous times—many of them small in themselves, but nevertheless capable of adding up to a big sum total in saving. Today is verily, the day of small things.

If every cook in the land will pledge herself wholeheartedly to the cause of economy—intelligently preserving, reserving, conserving, saving here and substituting there—the job of winning the war will be tremendously lightened. It is an encouraging fact that the more we practice economy the easier it grows. Also, we become proficient in finding out things for ourselves. Every American kitchen should average at least one original thrift discovery a month.

The Food Conservation Bureau at Washington is ever ready to give suggestions. In a recent bulletin, for example, we are told that in making ice cream honey may be substituted for sugar with splendid results. An ice cream concern in the far West has effected marked saving in sugar by using six pounds of strained honey and three pounds of sugar to forty-six pounds of milk and cream. Honey costs a little more than sugar, it is true, but it makes a fine grade of ice cream, and the saving in sugar amply justifies the plan.

Another economy measure is the use of potato butter as a cheap substitute for butter. Potato butter is made in England at a cost of less than ten cents per pound. Peel the potatoes and boil them until they fall to pieces and become floury. Then rub through a fine sieve into a warmed basin fourteen ounces of potatoes and add two ounces of butter or of margarine and a teaspoonful of salt. Stir the mixture until it is smooth, then mould it into rolls. Keep the rolls in a cool place. To make the appearance attractive use butter coloring. If the potato butter is to be kept for more than a few days a butter preservative should be added.

Do not forget, when you are economizing, that nuts are good concentrated food. Twenty single peanuts are about the same as the inch cube of cheese. Chew them thoroughly or grind them up for a cooked dish and eat them as an important part of your meal.

The poorest possible use for a man's brains is to think forever about himself.—Ex.

A bird, a bee, and a fair June flower Met one day in a sudden shower.

Never they minded the rain at all;
They laughed together to see it fall.

"I'm glad of the wet," said the bright Redbreast,
"The leaves were dusty about my nest."

"And so am I glad," said Golden Bee,
"Honey is sweeter when rain is free."

"I'm gladdest of all," said the fair June flower,
And she drank, drank, drank of the cooling shower.

Never they minded the rain a bit,
They held up their heads and smiled at it—

So gay, so happy, the lovely three,
A fair June flower, a bird, a bee!

The Flower Lady.

Rose Hill.

On the third day of her stay at grandmother's, Flora began to feel restless.
She had played in orchard and barnyard and garret until she had played herself tired. "What can I do now?"
was her question.

"Have you been out into the old garden?" asked grandmother, who had been sick for a long time and able to go nowhere at all.

But Flora replied that she thought gardens very pokey places.

"Try this one, anyway," grandmother urged. "It is a very sweet garden, and it must be lonely, too."

Flora obeyed, unwillingly. She crossed the yard with a slow step and opened a tiny white gate in the side fence. Once inside, she sank down upon the soft grass. "I believe I won't go any further yet," she decided. She looked toward the curved path. "In a minute," she said, a little drowsily, "I'll follow that path a short way."

When, after awhile, she found herself moving silently along, she was surprised to hear faint music somewhere near. She followed the sound, and came presently, at a bend in the path, upon a lovely lavender-colored tent about as high as her shoulder. The music was plainer than ever, and stooping down, she discovered that it was made by rows of dainty bluebells blown in the wind.

She parted the thick branches of lilac that formed the tent and peered inside, then gave a cry of surprise, for there, seated on a green velvet hassock, was the loveliest little lady she had ever seen.

The lady arose and came smiling through the lavender door. She was slim and graceful, like a lily, and her dress was creamy white, with a scalloped skirt. Her blue eyes were so like violets and her cheeks so near the pink of roses that Flora was startled.
Her hair was as yellow as daffodils, and she wore a cap that was like a snowdrop turned upside down.

"Who are you?" the little girl asked,
in wonder.

The other smiled. "I am Lady Flower," she said. Do sit down, and will you excuse me if I go on sewing while we talk? This work must be finished before dark." As she spoke she glanced at a queer little watch on her wrist that looked for the world, Flora thought, like an old-fashioned flower she had once heard somebody call "four o'clock," though she was not sure, having never cared much for flowers. She noticed, too, that Lady Flower wore a gold buttercup for a thimble, and that her needle was a slender thorn and her thread very fine. She was making a wonderful velvet rosette out of crimson petals.

They sat down under a taller lilac bush. "Why is it you have never come to see me before?" asked Lady Flower.

Flora hung her head. How could she tell this sweet person that she had come this time only because she had been sent?

"I very seldom see anybody from outside these days," the lady went on.
"You don't know how glad I am that you came."

They chatted for a long time and when at length it began to grow late and a little chilly Flora reluctantly rose to go. Lady Flower begged her to come again. "You haven't seen any of the pretty and curious things that I have in my home," she said. "The bees hold banquets here, and the birds have concerts every morning and evening. Often there is a butterfly dance, and you should see the costumes that those butterflies wear! You will love the flower children in my back yard, too, and the flower babies that are so small and sweet in their brown beds!"

She kissed her guest goodbye. "You haven't told me your name," she said.

When Flora told her she laughed.
"Now I am sure you'll come back," she cried, "for your very name means it!"

When Flora turned and looked about her, all at once she was beside the little white gate, and it was twilight.
"That's queer," she thought, and went slowly into the house.

She groped her way toward the big rocking chair by the window. "Grandmother Gray," she asked, "what does my name mean?"

"Your name means 'flowers,' dearie," came back a gentle voice, "and I chose it for you, too."

"O, I am so glad," Flora said. "And to think I didn't even know what a beautiful name I had! Grandmother, may I go and play in your garden every single day?"

When Johnnie Jones Was Lost.

Johnnie Jones was lost, completely lost. He looked up the street, he looked down the street, and then he looked across the street, but not one of the houses was his home. Johnnie Jones did not like being lost. He had not seen his mother for a very long time, not since she had left him in the yard to play, after they had returned from market. He had been swinging on the front gate, when suddenly he heard the sound of music, and saw several people running down the street.

"Every one must have forgotten to tell me that there was a circus," he said to himself. "I think I had better go see."

Now Johnnie Jones was never allowed to leave the yard unless an older person was with him, but he did not think of that as he opened the gate and ran out in the street to follow the gathering crowd.

When he reached the first corner every one was hurrying on to the next, and Johnnie Jones hurried on, too. Of course, however, he could not run as fast as older people, and very soon he was passed by the crowd. Then, when he could no longer hear the music, he looked about him, and knew that he was lost.

He was sorry that he had gone away from home. He thought it must be about luncheon time, and he was very hungry. Then he remembered that this was the day mother had promised to take him to the park. He would have cried, had he not been a brave little lad, and had he not known that a boy almost four is too old to cry unless he is actually hurt.

He sat down on the curbstone, and wished and wished that some one would come to find him.

"After a while he saw a policeman coming toward him from across the street. He was a very tall policeman, but Johnnie Jones decided to speak to him. His mother had often told him that policemen always take care of people and help them whenever they can.
So he lifted his hat politely and said:
"Please, Mr. Policeman, will you find me? Because I'm lost."

The policeman smiled down at Johnnie Jones until Johnnie Jones smiled up at the policeman and forgot what a little boy he was. Then the officer litted him in his strong arms and asked him his name. Johnnie Jones could tell him his name, but he could not tell him which way he had come from home. So they decided to go to the nearest drug store and find the number of the house.

The policeman began to tell him stories about his own little boy, whose name was Johnnie Green, and Johnnie Jones was so interested that he forgot to be tired. Just before they reached the drug store, Johnnie Jones heard a dog barking. He looked around; there was the very dog that lived next door to him and played with him every day.
"Oh!" he said, "I know that dog.
He is Max, and he can find the way home. You'll take me home, won't you, Max?" he asked the dog, who was so glad to see his little neighbor that he was trying his best to kiss him on the face.

"All right," the big policeman said,
"but I'll come, too, so I shall know where you live if you are ever lost again."

Max wagged his tail and began to trot home. Johnnie Jones trotted after Max, and the policeman after Johnnie
Jones. It was not very long before they could see the house, and there was mother standing at the gate, looking up the street, and down the street, and across the street, for her little boy.
When she saw him she ran to meet him and clasped him in her arms.

"Mother, dear," said Johnnie Jones.
"I was lost, and the policeman found me, and then Max found us both, and I shall never again go to see a circus by myself."

Mother told him that the band of music he had heard did not belong to a circus, but was the Citizens' Band on its way to the park, and that, since so much time had passed while Johnnie
Jones was lost, it was too late for him to go to the park that day. Of course the little boy was sorry to miss the treat, but he was very glad to be at home once more.

Mother shook hands with the policeman, and thanked him for being so kind to her boy. As soon as he had gone she and Johnnie Jones went into the house for their lunch, and afterward the little fellow was so tired that he fell asleep in mother's lap, and dreamed that he was a tall policeman finding lost boys.—Carolyn Verhoeff, in Kindergarten Review.

The Underfoot Folk.

Be careful, don't trample the Underfoot Folk!

Miss Spider's so proud of that web nearly spun

From flower to flower. If a beam of it broke

Her heart would break too, e'er the weaving was done.

Mr. Grasshopper knows he can hop if he must,

But he's traveled all day, and he's tired and small,

While your heel on that ant-hill, reared proudly of dust,

Means panic of thousands in no time at all.

Be gentle, don't worry the Underfoot Folk!

Mrs. Ladybug hurries in frightened return

To her far-away house, for she's smelling the smoke—

"Your house is afire! Your children will burn!"

That snail you were prodding needs all of his strength

With his house for a burden, so leave him alone;

And the granddaddy-longlegs you're holding at length

Values each of his legs as you value your own.

Look sharp how you deal with the poor, tiny things,

For if tables should turn 'twouldn't be such a joke

To watch them swell out with their wings and their stings

While you shrank to the size of the Underfoot Folk!

The Quarrel.

Hazel B. Jocelyn, aged 14, Eden, Md.)

It was a beautiful day in June. Birds, flowers, bees and everything else seemed happy except little Dorothy Ellen Babcock. She sat on the doorstep and pouted. Dorothy was very pretty when she was not cross. She had short yellow curls, big blue eyes and a rosy mouth. But her mouth was now drooping at the corners, and big tears fell from her blue eyes.

Uncle Jack, coming around the corner suddenly, picked up the little girl, and tossing her in his arms, asked her what was the matter. He was surprised, for she was usually light-hearted.

"Oh, Uncle Jack," she sobbed, "I'm never going to school any more—never!"

"Come, come, Dolly; show me your dimples," her uncle answered. "I have my ear right around the corner and I know a little girl who likes chocolate sundae and moving pictures. Tell your Uncle Jack why you're not going to school any more."

"If I tell you will you beg mother to let me stay home from school?" said Dorothy, coaxingly. "Dear me," said Uncle Jack, "Is this the little girl who was saying last week how she loved to go to school?"

"But that was before Mary and I quarreled," Dorothy said in a low tone.

"You're not mad with Mary, are you, Dolly? Well, tell me everything about it, and I will try and fix it right."

"It was on Thursday," began Dorothy. "Mary went to school and left me. I—I guess I was pretty late, 'cause I couldn't find my hat and slate, and then when I'd gone three blocks I found I had forgotten my pencil case and had to come back after it. Anyway, Mary was gone and Mrs. Graham told me Mary didn't think I was coming or she would have waited, but I didn't believe it. Uncle Jack, I suppose I was pretty mean to Mary after that. At recess, when she smiled and asked me what made me so late, I told her it was none of her business and that she needn't wait for me any more, and she got mad and said she wouldn't. Then I made a face at her and she made one at me, and afterward she went marching around with Elsie and Susie. Susie said, 'Come on, Dorothy,' but I wouldn't, 'cause she was with Mary. Ever since that they've all let me alone. I'm glad today is Saturday, and I don't want to go to school any more. Uncle Jack—I wish—I wish we hadn't quarreled."

Dorothy was almost in tears again by this time, but Uncle Jack only smiled and said, "Run in the house and get your hat, and we'll go for a spin."

Soon they were gliding smoothly down the avenue—not downtown where they usually went, but up in the other direction.

"Where are we going, Uncle Jack?" asked Dorothy in surprise.

"Wait and see," he answered, laughing.

As they drove slowly past a certain side street Uncle Jack said, "What's that place?"

Dorothy gasped as she saw a pretty little playhouse with a flower pot in the window.

"Why, that's where Mary and I play house."

"What a pity," mused Uncle Jack, "that you and Mary have quarreled. I was thinking of taking her along—you know she usually goes. I was going to take you two to see 'Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm' at the movies tonight. By the way, didn't I hear you and Mary saying how much you wanted to see that particular play?"

But Dorothy didn't answer. She was staring very hard at a brick house they were nearing; a little girl about her own age came walking slowly around the house. How Dorothy wished they were good friends again! She seized her uncle's arm tightly and said, "There she is, Uncle Jack; there's Mary! Oh, do stop the car!"

But the car was already stopped.

"Hello, Mary!" Uncle Jack called to the sober-faced little girl with black eyes. "Hop in; we are on our way to see 'Rebecca of Sunnybrook Farm!'"

"Did I say sober-faced little girl? If I did you must excuse me, for next to Dorothy, Mary was the brightest-faced little girl in town when she heard that."

No word of forgiveness was said, for none was necessary—just a squeeze of the hand.

"I'm wild to see Rebecca, ain't you, Dolly?" Mary said. "And won't some ice cream taste good?"

"Not as good as it seems to be friends once more," whispered Dorothy. "And don't you wish it was Monday, so we could go to school again?"

"I've Thought of Somebody."

I've thought of somebody—a young woman. She was an orphan, at an early age adopted by a relative and brought up in his home. Later on she became a queen. She was very lovely, and we are told that she "obtained favor in the eyes of all that looked upon her." On one occasion she saved the life of her husband, the king. The greatest event of her life, however, was when by her good influence she saved from death not only her beloved foster father, but also hundreds of her own countrymen. The wicked man who would have brought about their death was himself slain.

Who was the young woman?

Answer to last week's question: Saul, afterwards St. Paul.

A Garden Helper.

"I wish I could kill them all dead—every one in all the world!" cried Trot. "Whew-ee!" said Uncle Jimmy. "That's a large order. What is it that you want to kill off?"

"Them," explained Trot, pointing a fat finger at a long pink worm on the wet sidewalk. "There was more, but Billy took them. He says it rained them last night."

"It didn't rain worms any more than it rained dogs and cats," said Uncle Jimmy. "Earthworms like the damp and they come out to enjoy it. That's the reason there are so many out this morning, just as there are more little boys and girls out on a sunny day than on a rainy one. Do you like potatoes, Trot?"

Trot's face brightened as she nodded her head.

"And carrots?"

"Course," said Trot, beaming.

"And strawberries?" went on Uncle Jimmy, picking his small niece up.

"Oh, my!" gurgled Trot. "Is it going to be a party?"

"It is not! You had a party yesterday. That ought to do a small girl for one while. But I was going to say if you should go and kill all of those nice worms—"

"Nice! Uncle Jimmy, they're horrid!"

"If every single one of them should be killed off, by and by there wouldn't be any more potatoes, nor carrots, nor strawberries growing out of the ground for little girls and their uncles to eat."

"What have worms got to do with what we eat?" asked Trot.

"They have a lot to do with it. Aside from all the little fishes that are caught by means of angle worms—"

"Like Billy does," put in Trot.

"Not counting them, Trot, earthworms are great big helpers when it comes to food for us. They are forever busy burrowing and burrowing under the ground. This opens up passages for the water and air, and loosens the ground so that the tiny rootlets of plants can easily push through it to suck up nourishment. The worms eat the earth, too—"

"Eat it!" repeated Trot.

"Yes, they take the soil into their systems and probably get some food from it. Then they throw it out again in a richer form and this makes the soil much richer, so that plants will grow better."

"I 'spect they help father in the garden more than I do," said Trot.

"They always help and they never do any harm."

Trot hung her head.

"I only pulled up plants 'stead of weeds once," she said.

"Well, anyway, if all the earthworms disappeared, in time the soil would become so dry and hard and so poor that none of the vegetables and fruits you are so fond of could grow. Where now?" as Trot slipped off his knee.

"I'm going to put him on a stick and carry him to the strawberry bed," replied Trot. "He might as well be working."—Janet Thomas Van Osdal.

RESOLUTIONS UPON THE DEATH OF BISHOP A. M. RANDOLPH ADOPTED BY THE BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF THE ST. PAUL NORMAL AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOL, LAWRENCEVILLE, VA., WEDNESDAY, MAY 22, 1918.

Whereas, through the dispensation of an all-wise Providence, one of our number, the beloved and honored Bishop of the Diocese and President of our Board, the Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., LL. D., has left us after a long, honorable and useful career, a life full of good deeds and the mark of human kindness, utterly devoid of pomp or affectation, but strong in all manly and Christian virtues and in those qualities of head and heart which make men truly great, and which made him indeed one of nature's noblemen; and

Whereas, in the administration of his duties as President of the Board of Trustees he was ever faithful, vigilant and mindful of the interests and welfare of the school which stands for the elevation, Christianization and moral and mental development of the negro race, and which to him represented the Church's sense of obligation and responsibility for complete regeneration and emancipation of the negro from darkness into the marvelous light of the true Gospel; and

Whereas, he accepted this responsibility for himself as well as for the Church, and no phase of the Church's work made a stronger appeal to him than its negro work; and no man in the Church felt keener than he his sense of personal responsibility and obligation for the welfare and progress of the negro work and none discharged his duty towards it more generously or unselfishly; therefore be it

Resolved, That we, his associates and co-workers on the Board, desire first to record our acknowledgment of his splendid services to the school and to humanity, and then to express our sense of appreciation of the beautiful and helpful life he lived—a life that was consecrated to the uplift of his fellow-men and the enrichment of humanity;

Resolved, That while we bow in humble submission to the Divine will, yet we cannot refrain from expressing our sense of sorrow and personal loss at the translation of our colleague;

Resolved, further and finally, That a copy of this preamble and these resolutions be spread upon the records of this Board, a copy sent to the Southern Missioner and the Church papers and one forwarded to the bereaved family.

Frost, the Rev. C. A. Capwell, of Racine, who read the Litany, and the Rev. G. W. Schroeder, of Milwaukee. Mr. Williams has been working in Holy Innocents' parish, Racine; Mr. Matheus is in charge of St. Edmund's mission, Milwaukee; Mr. Frisbie will spend the summer in mountain work in North Carolina, and Mr. Burroughs is in charge of St. Peter's Mission, Milwaukee.

In St. Matthew's Church, Bloomington, Ill., on Sunday, May 12, Bishop Sherwood advanced to the priesthood the Rev. John Turner Lillard, Jr., deacon in charge of St. Andrew's Church Paris, Ill., where he will continue as rector. Mr. Lillard was presented by the rector of St. Matthew's, the Rev. William Baker, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Raymond M. Gunn, of Chester, Ill.

A Hymn for Departing of Absent Friends.

(To the tune sung to "Art Thou Weary, Art Thou Languid.")

Holy Father, in Thy mercy,
Hear our earnest prayer;
Keep our loved ones in their absence
'Neath Thy care.

Jesus, Saviour, let Thy presence
Be their light and guide;
Keep, O keep them in their weakness
At Thy side.

When in sorrow, when in danger,
When in loneliness,
In Thy love look down and comfort
Their distress.

May the joy of Thy salvation
Be their strength and stay;
May they love and may they praise Thee
Day by day.

Holy Spirit, let Thy teaching
Sanctify their life;
Send Thy grace, that they may conquer
In the strife.

Father, Son and Holy Spirit,
God the One in Three,
Bless them, guide them, save them, keep them
Near to Thee. Amen.

DOCTOR SAYS NUXATED IRON WILL INCREASE STRENGTH OF DELICATE PEOPLE IN TWO WEEKS' TIME

In many instances says City Physician persons have suffered for years without knowing what made them feel tired, listless and run-down when their real trouble was lack of iron in the blood—how to tell.

IF you were to make an actual blood test on all people who are ill you would probably be greatly astonished at the exceedingly large number who lack iron and who are ill for no other reason than the lack of iron. The element iron is supplied a multitude of dangerous symptoms disappear. Without iron the blood at once loses the power to change food into living tissue and therefore nothing you eat does you good; you don't get the strength out of it. Your food merely passes through your system like corn through a mill with the rollers so wide apart that the mill can't grind. As a result of this continuous blood and nerve starvation, people become generally weakened, nervous and all run down and frequently develop all sorts of conditions. One is too thin; another is burdened with unhealthy fat; some are so weak they can hardly walk; some think they have dyspepsia, kidney or liver trouble; some can't sleep at night, others are sleepy and tired all day; some fussy and irritable; some skinny and bloodless, but all lack physical power and endurance. In such cases, it is worse than foolishness to take stimulating medicines or narcotic drugs, which only whip up your flagging vital powers for the moment, maybe at the expense of your life later.

on. No matter what any one tells you, if you are not strong and well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see for yourself how much you have gained. You can talk as you please about all the wonders wrought by new remedies, but when you come down to hard facts there is nothing like good old iron to put color in your cheeks and good, sound, healthy flesh on your bones. It is also a great nerve and stomach strengthener and one of the best blood builders in the world. The only trouble was that the old forms of inorganic iron like tincture of iron, iron acetate, etc., often ruined people's teeth, upset their stomachs and were not assimilated and for these reasons they frequently did more harm than good. But with the discovery of the newer forms of organic iron all this has been overcome. Nuxated Iron, for example, is pleasant to take, does not injure the teeth and is almost immediately beneficial.

Manufacturer's Note: Nuxated Iron which is recommended above is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser, or they will refund the money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

Be Ye Merciful, Even as Your Father.

How this command of our Lord shall resound throughout the whole world in these dark and troublesome days! Mercy is one of the attributes of God. It is the bow that rests upon the bosom of the cloud, and the light that hovers above the judgment throne. There is no virtue that is more universally attractive. The prevailing spirit of the Gospel is mercy towards a poor and sinful world. Mercy is not a blind passion, but the operation of a sweet charity. With some men mercy is all outward: there is no heart in it. True mercifulness must go down to the inner springs of action. It dare not stop short of guiding principles, but it must have its roots in sound and holy motives. It is the outgrowth of the heart, which seeks not its own, but the good of others, and strives to do the will of Him "who is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy."

Jesus was the man of mercy. He taught His disciples how to be merciful. He was merciful to all, not only to some. All men were His brethren, for all were God's children. His mercy was all-pervading and all-embracing.

This is the mercy we are to exercise towards the brethren. Life is full of occasions when we may be merciful. We should be merciful not only in acts, but in words. Frequently "a word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver." It requires more grace to be kind in thought and word than in deed. A great deal of the mercy that men dispense in our day does not come from the heart, and hence will never bless the giver. While we pray for mercy, let that same prayer teach us all to render the deeds of mercy.—The Reformed Church Messenger.

In Your Place.

It is a great mistake into which we fall, so many of us, that of supposing that in order to have dignity and value as a man we must pursue this calling rather than that; that if we do not, we are clean gone forever; that we are no more valuable or valued; and that all significance is eliminated from life. Many a youth is crowded full with the thought that if he can only leave his father's farm and stand behind a city counter he is made; that a leap from the farm behind the counter elevates him from henceforth; that buckram and broadcloth will put the dignity and value into him as well as on him. Poor simpleton that he is, and, for that matter, that we all are, for the young man is only following out the ideas which he has learned from us. Why will we not all learn that it is standing in our lot and place and working for the glory of God there which gives true value and dignity to life! Viewed from the heights of yonder heaven, a man has no dignity and no true value who does not live for the glory of God.—James Drummond.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

If we hold on to sin for a day we may have to hold on to it for ever.

The hand that is thrust into every hole will somewhere find a snake to bite it.—Ex.

Undertake to keep the ten commandments, and you will soon find out that God is their maker.

When man makes a religion, he tries to make one that will let him stay mean and still respect himself.

The bad thing about a rolling stone is not that it gathers no moss, but that it is always going down hill.

He that will not reason is a bigot; he that cannot reason is a fool; and he that dare not reason is a slave.

The first duty we owe to the world is to tell those who come within our immediate influence what Christ is to us.

The present times are extraordinary and call for an extraordinary response. The present call is for men who are ready to live extraordinary lives.

If you use what light you have, you are always bound to get more; and if you do not use what light you have, God will not waste His further light upon you.—A. T. Pierson.

God dwells in the light of joy as well as of purity, and instead of becoming more like Him as we become more miserable, and as all the brightness and glory of life are extinguished, we become more like God as our blessedness becomes more complete.

One of the most winsome features of the biblical way of salvation is this: On the one hand, it is so simple that the unlearned can find it and walk in it, and, on the other hand, it is so profound that the most erudite can spend their lives in discovering new beauties about it every day.

I heard a wood thrush in the dusk
Twirl three notes and make a star—
My heart that walked with bitterness
Came back from very far.

Three shining notes were all he had,
And yet they made a starry call—
I caught life back against my breast
And kissed it, scars and all.

Give me Christian young men. They endure the monotony better than Non-Christian men and their valor is unequaled in the hour of crisis. This prevalent idea that the dare-devil and harum-scarum men make the best fighters is all wrong. The decent-living man is the decent fighting man.—General Byng.

It seldom happens that great men, whether clergy or laity, reform their lives, because they seldom meet with persons of courage to oppose them, or to tell them of their faults.—Bishop Thomas Wilson.

Shall I Take Away Pain?

The cry of man's anguish went up unto God:

"Lord, take away pain—
The shadow that darkens the world
Thou hast made,
The close-coiling chain
That strangles the heart, the burden that weighs
On the wings that would soar—
Lord, take away pain from the world
Thou hast made,
That it love Thee the more!"

Then answered the Lord to the cry of His world:

"Shall I take away pain,
And with it the power of the soul to endure,
Made strong by the strain?
Shall I take away pity, that knits heart to heart,
And sacrifice high?
Will ye lose all your heroes that lift from the fire
White brows to the sky?
Shall I take away love, that redeems with a price
And smiles at its loss?
Can ye spare from your lives, that would climb unto mine,
The Christ on His cross?"
—Author Unknown.

Remember This.

God loves each one of us with an intensity infinitely beyond what the most fervid human spirit ever felt toward another and with a concentration as if He had none else to think of. And His love has brought us into being, just that we might be taught to enter into full sympathy with Him, receiving His—giving our own—thus entering into the joy of our Lord. This is the hope—the sure and certain hope—set before us; sure and certain, for "the mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the Lord that hath mercy on thee."—Erskine.

Renew Your Health At Nature's Fountain

Without the Expense and Loss of Time Necessary for a Visit to the Spring

THE CRISIS

There comes a time in the life of practically every man and woman when their digestive or eliminative organs, or both, fail to respond to drugs prepared by human skill. In fact drugs seem to do them about as much harm as good for their systems rebel against all drugs. These are the cases which physicians call "stubborn" and "chronic" for the reason that they persist in spite of drug treatment. I do not refer to incurable diseases such as cancer and consumption, but to that larger class of functional disorders which we meet every day, where the organs of digestion and elimination are impaired.

For this class of cases our best physicians and our big city specialists send their wealthy patients to the mineral springs where, in the great majority of cases they are permanently restored or decidedly benefited. But what about the poor man who has not the money or the busy man or woman who cannot spare the time to spend several weeks or possibly months at a health resort? Shall circumstances deny them the restoration to health which Nature has provided? Read my answer in the coupon at the bottom of this page.

I have the utmost confidence in the Shivar Mineral Spring Water for to it I owe my Restoration to Health and probably my Life. It has made me tens of thousands of friends in all parts of America and even in foreign countries, whose faces I have never seen. Yet I count them my friends for the Shivar Spring Water has bound them to me by lasting gratitude.

I ask you to read their letters, a few samples of which I publish below for your benefit, and if you find among them any encouragement as to your own health do not hesitate to accept my offer which has no limits or conditions except those shown on the coupon. If you could read the letters that come to me daily, numbering about ten thousand a year, and the vast majority of them similar to those printed below, you would not wonder that I make this offer displaying my absolute confidence in the restorative powers of Shivar Mineral Water.

INDIGESTION

Savannah, Georgia.
I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well, and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

La Grange, Ga., Nov. 25, 1914.
I feel it my duty to suffering humanity to make public announcement of the benefits I have derived from Shivar Spring Water. I have been a sufferer for the past twenty-five years from indigestion and dyspepsia. After one week's trial of Shivar Water I commenced to improve, and after drinking it for four weeks I gained fifteen pounds. I feel better and stronger than I have in twenty-five years. I strongly recommend this Water to any one with stomach trouble of any character, and truly believe it will cure ulcer of the stomach. I am writing this voluntarily and trust it will fall in the hands of many who are so unfortunate as to be afflicted with indigestion and nervous dyspepsia.

C. V. TRUITT,
President Unity Cotton Mills.

DYSPEPSIA

Baltimore, Md., April 30, 1914.
For many years I suffered with stomach trouble as a direct result of asthma. I consulted the very best specialist in this country, and spent quite a large sum of money in my endeavor to get relief. However, I had about come to the conclusion that my case was hopeless, but by accident I happened to get hold of one of your booklets, and decided to try Shivar Spring Water. After drinking the water for about three weeks I was entirely relieved, and since that time have suffered but little inconvenience from my trouble. I cheerfully recommend the use of your Water to any one that may be suffering from stomach trouble.

It is a great pleasure to tell you that your Water has been a great benefit. I may say a great blessing, to me. My wife says it has helped me more than anything else I ever tried. I have been, for thirty years, a sufferer from stomach trouble.

REV. E. H. ROWE,
Co-President Southern Seminary.

RHEUMATISM

Leeds, S. C.
I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder troubles, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.

Florence, S. C.
I suffered with indigestion and kidney trouble, and a year ago was stricken with acute articular rheumatism; was helpless for months, and since using your Spring Water I am walking without any crutch and improving daily. Indigestion much relieved. I wish I could write Shivar Spring Water in the sky so that the world could become acquainted with it.

MRS. THEO. KUKER.

BILIOUSNESS

Greenville, S. C., Feb. 26, 1914.
For over two years, following a nervous breakdown, I have suffered with a liver so torpid that ordinary remedies were absolutely powerless. Under such circumstances, I came to Shivar Spring, and began drinking the Water. Upon advice however, the first night I took a laxative; the second night a milder one. Since then I have taken none at all. The effect of the water has been remarkable — its action on my liver most marked, and my health and spirits greatly improved. I am satisfied that the laxative, followed by the Water, was the proper treatment in my case. My condition is now perfect.

S. A. DERIEUX.

RENAL AND CYSTIC

Columbia, S. C.
I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder to the extent that I would have to get up during the night some five or six times. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

J. P. D.

High Point, N. C., Oct. 6, 1914.
My wife has had a bad kidney trouble for several years. She has been using the water only about three weeks and it has already made her a new woman. Her color is much improved her appetite is all that she could wish for, her digestion seems to be perfect. We give Shivar Springs credit for it all.

T. G. S.

GALLSTONES

Greenville, S. C.
Shivar Spring Water cured my mother of gallstones, or, I might say, it snatched her from the hospital door, as the doctors had said nothing short of an operation would do her any good. After drinking the Water she was able to get out of bed, and is today stout and healthy. I hope these few lines will be of help to some one suffering as my mother did.

W. J. STRAWN.

Williamston, N. C., Oct. 3, 1914
My doctor said I would have to be operated on for gallstones, but since I have been drinking your water I haven't had to have a doctor.

Seek Thou Me.

Because I seek Thee not, oh, seek Thou me!

Because my lips are dumb, oh, hear the cry

I do not utter as Thou passest by,
 And from my life-long bondage set me free!

Because content I perish, far from Thee,
 Oh, seize me, snatch me from my fate,
 and try

My soul in Thy consuming fire. Draw nigh

And let me, blinded, Thy salvation see.

If I were pouring at Thy feet my tears,
 If I were clamoring to see Thy face,
 I should not need Thee, Lord, as now I need,

Whose dumb, dead soul knows neither hopes nor fears,

Nor dreads the outer darkness of this place—

Because I seek not, pray not, give Thou heed!

—L. C. Moulton.

I think, also, that if this Church is to have a place of religious leadership in the country, we must get into a better relation with the churches about us, stop making claims and remove the suspicion of being exclusive and ungenerous. There is something which I would call snobbery which has been a blight upon the life of the mother Church across the sea, in its attitude toward nonconformity and dissent and we have brought something like it across the sea and it is not only entirely unchristian, but it is against the spirit of our people, and it will only do the Church harm. We are deeply attached to our own Church; we are thankful that its continuity in organization and faith from Apostolic times is unbroken and that no other Church has anything more in the way of association with the past than we preserve and desire. It is not a time so much to talk about ancestry as it is to show efficiency in dealing in the spirit of Christ and in accordance with the truths of the Gospel, with great companies of people under new conditions of life.—Bishop Lines, Convention Address.

We must realize that such a transition is taking place to-day, and we must be ready to lead men out of the tottering ruins of their false security up to the fundamental things of God, those things without which there can be no safety or peace or growth for the soul. We cannot lead to those heights unless we are led. We cannot lift unless we are lifted. At the foot of a blood-stained Cross that for all the ages has spelled self-sacrificing love, we must empty ourselves of self, and renew our strength and go on up the way that leads to complete self-surrender to the will of God. The world, in its agony, is not asking for pious phrases or smooth sayings, or the old cry of peace, peace, when there is no peace, but it is asking in a thousand tongues and in a thousand ways to be shown the Christ. Weary and anxious and sick at heart, it is turning to Him, even as the lusty child, stricken suddenly in the midst of boisterous play, cries out for the mother who alone can soothe and heal. The Church, through you and through me, must answer the cry. We must with our lips, above all, with our lives, be able to say to the world's anguished heart, "Behold, behold, the Lamb of God that taketh away the sins of the world."—Bishop Darst, Council Address.

Salvation.

I am thankful to believe that my final salvation does not depend wholly on myself. If it did, it would be at stake to the very last. Salvation involves so much. It includes deliverance from sin, development of character, fitness to dwell with God. Man's faith is often such a frail thing. It were a poor refuge, if there were no Divine purpose to support it. It becomes a sure defense if God says, "I pledge that man's deliverance." It is gloriously true that faith in Christ transfers the responsibility of salvation to the Saviour, and makes deliverance certain.—J. E. Roberts.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

THE MELTING-POT.

Newspaper writers in these days know that there is no more popular "copy" than that describing the doings of our boys in France, how they are bearing themselves amid their new surroundings, how they are preparing to do their big part in the conflict, what impression they make among the English and French with whom they fraternize. All too little comes through to satisfy our pardonable curiosity, but that little makes mighty pleasant reading as a rule and gives us every assurance that they will prove worthy of our best hopes for them. A syndicated letter to the London Times, dated from the British Headquarters in France, presents an attractive picture:

"At the roadside groups of men stand chatting, whose khaki tunics have an unfamiliar cut. Smart looking officers go by with very yellow boots and wide brimmed hats, tipped slightly forward and caught by a leather strap at the back of the head.

"They are stout material, all of them, with an air of self-reliance and competence, but curiously quiet and unassuming. French and British soldiers alike look on their arrival in some new locality with very much the same air of patronage as older boys at school regard the influx of newcomers at the beginning of a term.

"But any excuse is good enough for making friends and to start exchanging cigarettes.

"Of the earnestness and determination of the whole of the American forces there is no manner of question. No new comrades ever came to fight for a cause more evidently bent on proving themselves worthy, nor were any ever received in a spirit of more sincere friendliness.

"I spent some time yesterday at the headquarters of an American division. This particular unit is as fine a lot of men as could be got together in any country.

"There are privates who are millionaires or thereabouts. The ranks contain everything from college graduates to professional pugilists. How many nationalities are represented in these new units no one ventured to count, but there's probably no man living who could call the roll and pronounce every name as it ought to be pronounced in the country of its origin.

"There's a pure-blooded Chinaman on the staff and the first name I saw at the United States headquarters was most undeniably German. Many of the best non-commissioned officers are Jews.

"All this, however, means little except to increase the miracle of it all and as a testimony to the efficiency of the fusion in that magician's melting pot the fire beneath which is pride in 'Old Glory.'

"These stalwart men have all been Americans now for a generation or two. There are no hyphens in their patriotism and, if anything, knowledge of difference of origin only adds to the keenness and determination of each man to show he's as good an American and can fight in liberty's cause a trifle better than the next.

"Experts at color blending like dyers, carpet weavers and tapestry workers have long known that while two or three tints may clash, if you mix enough, no matter how elementary and discordant, the result is one harmonious whole.

"I doubt if any army now fighting in this war feels as passionately a sense of common patriotism as do the units in this mass, made up of individuals whose names their grandfathers would have found mutually unpronounceable.

"In close proximity at the moment are British units and it is hard to say which speaks of the other with more enthusiasm. The Americans are eloquent in praise of the helpfulness and comradeship of the British and the latter are enormously impressed by the keenness and deadly earnestness of their new allies. In theory it is the Americans who are doing all the learning and the British out of their hard-won knowledge are only anxious to help and teach. But there is even a profound suspicion that the Americans are teaching about as much as they learn."

One cannot help feeling that here is something that is as it ought to be, a bright spot among the many deplorable aspects of bloody war. Artificial or unessential distinctions between man and man, class and class, even nation and nation, melt away in the face of a great adventure for humanity; and this, not by any revolutionary process or labored propaganda but as the natural and necessary result of united purpose in the pursuit of a great common duty. Differences of habit and training, of capacity and character and conviction still exist and will exist, as they ought. Social, political or racial distinctions have not lost their meaning or uses. Each army, each class, each type retains the characteristics peculiar to it and each man his unimpaired personality. But the selfish, divisive and isolating element in all these is dissolved and dissipated, just as the smaller interests and ambitions by which they were cultivated have been absorbed, in the paramount obligations of the hour. Is every unit, every man, loyal to the common cause, and is each bringing his utmost of strength, resource and courage into the great struggle? Then no man will fail to fraternize with another or to feel his need each for the other, and units of differing language, differing traditions and differing uniforms will blend into one great army.

It is a wonderful thing and fraught with great possibilities for the world's future. Can the Church look upon that spectacle and see it through to the end and learn no lesson, or must it ever be true that "the children of this world are wiser in their generation than the children of light"?

What is the secret of the unity over there where the fight is going on? It lies in the fact that the fight is going on, and the fight is a so much bigger thing than anything that has ever engaged the provincial or traditional or selfish lives of these men heretofore. Commercial travelers and Cook's tourists have been to France in great numbers before now, and there have been literary and scientific and diplomatic exchanges without number, but never such union of hands and purpose or such mingling of colors as this; because never before have the allied nations realized what liberty and civilization and democracy meant to them and the cost at which they must be established and defended. But when these are seen to be at stake, and the great principles upon which a new world was being built were ruthlessly attacked and threatened with overthrow, then every lesser consideration takes its lesser place and the great struggle for the thing that is essential brings them into one camp and one council, united for one great end.

Beside that how trivial, how almost mean and base, seem the things which divide men into cliques and parties, absorbing their interests and exciting their rivalry! A popular periodical lately contained an amusing story in which the hero, a well-meaning but illiterate draftie, declares his willingness to fight "to make the world safe for the Democratic party." The remark was humorous not because of its distortion of a noble sentiment but because of the incongruous idea suggested. Who would fight in view of the issues which engage men to-day, or, indeed, at any time save with words and bluster, for the Democratic party or any other party. But for democracy we will die. The success of the party has seemed tremendously important at times, but once the country is united in fighting for something more vital than mere party principles the party-man is frowned upon as a sower of discord and a sapper of the nation's strength.

Has the great Church Universal no cause to maintain, no end to serve, of such paramount value and superlative importance that she can afford to forget in the defence and prosecution of it the minor differences which have divided her? Is there no warfare in which she is called to engage against a foe so powerful, so ruthless, so determined, as to demand the combination of all her forces; and with issues of such tremendous import to the whole and to every part alike that to refuse such union of strength and resources is disloyalty if not treachery to the common cause? While the liberty-loving nations, and the cliques and parties in those nations, were pursuing the ends of freedom and justice each in its own particular way, and very largely mingling their efforts with other aims and designs that were provincial and selfish and destructive, there was growing up among them secretly an adverse power with a single sinister aim whose strength they did not measure and whose treachery they did not suspect. When the storm broke people after people were swept away before it, and that the civilized world has not fallen victim to its devouring sword is due to the fact that it united for defense and the overthrow of the common enemy. And the nations of the world are learning that before humanity is safe and a true civilization is made secure there must be an organized world-wide unity of free men and peoples which can conserve the larger interests of the world. They know not yet how it will come about, only that it must come about; and the men of many names and many nations whose blood mingles as it is poured out in the trenches of France are paying the price and paying the way for its coming. When it comes, this world knit together for common safety and a common purpose, will it be a Christian world, a world in which the Christian Church stands as the supreme witness for God and teacher of righteousness? Surely the Church of Christ, which is to-day the very symbol of disintegration and disunion, cannot fulfil that office unless she too can come together. And unless the lessons God is teaching to-day shall be learned by the Church as well as by the world, unless she learns that the mission and witness for which she is created of God demand her unity and the things which divide her are but the partial conceptions or misconceptions of her charter blotted and blurred by human accretions and emendations, then doubtless she too must pass through the fires and be purified that she may be fused into one and fitted for the uses of the God of order and of peace.

May He raise up at this time in His Church men of vision to see, men of wisdom to lead, men of grace to command, that His people may be taught His will and be brought to the obedience of it!

"We Know and Have Believed."

What a striking incident was that mentioned by Bishop Tucker in his Council Address, illustrating the relation of Science-knowledge and Faith-knowledge and their values.

"I was told that, in the midst of delirium, when the mind of him whom we honored in our service this morning was wandering, he said, 'Give my love to old Gatewood' (Gatewood, whom we older men remember as a faithful minister in Norfolk, was sixty-five years ago Bishop Randolph's professor of Mathematics at the College of William and Mary), 'Give my love to old Gatewood, and tell him that I am still learning, two and two make four.' Then as the tired brain touched the fringe of the certainties of mathematics, his eyes glistened and his voice rang out: 'I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth, and in Jesus Christ His only Son, our Lord; I believe in the Holy Ghost, the resurrection of the body and the life everlasting.'"

None understood better than Bishop Randolph or appreciated with a keener mind the beauty, the certainty or the value of scientific truth. That "two and two make four" was to him a sacred fact which in its manifold implications was never to be forgotten or ignored. But none knew better the limitations of this kind of knowledge, that it could never satisfy the needs of the heart. One can almost see the movement of his unconscious mind following a familiar line from the certitudes of science to the greater certitudes of faith and resting there with triumphant assurance both of mind and heart.

"We know and have believed the love of God in us," says St. John the Divine. It is no tautology, no inexactness of expression. There is much we can know of God and eternal life, we being true to the laws of thought. There is much more that we believe with a confidence no less absolute, being true to the testimony of our own souls if so be that "God dwelleth in us and His love is perfected in us."

Church Pension Fund Bulletin, Number One. Through the courtesy of Mr. Sayre, Secretary of the Fund, we have received an advance copy of this Bulletin, which will shortly reach the clergy interested and will be sent to any others desiring it. It is a preliminary statement anticipating for the information of the Church some facts which will be more fully embraced in the Annual Report of the Trustees at the end of the present fiscal year. The temporary distribution and future destination of the surplus of the Initial Reserve Fund are given as has been previously explained in our columns. It is gratifying to know that over ninety per cent of the assessments normally due from parishes are being paid. Annuities have already been granted to 186 persons. The Fund has successfully inaugurated a great business whose financial stability seems well assured.

BISHOP TUCKER'S MEMORIAL ADDRESS ON BISHOP RANDOLPH.

Brethren of the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Southern Virginia:

The Council meets this morning under the shadow of a great loss—yet it is a loss so recent that we scarcely realize that we may not have with us the gracious presence of our beloved Father in God, who for so many years has cared for the Church in the Diocese.

There still flashes across our memories the light that shone upon his face. Still there echo in our hearts the wonderful tones of his voice. Still we seem to feel the subtle charm of that unique personality, with its mark of intellectual power and clarity, with its kindly gift of wit and humor, with its genius for loving.

I have thought that it would be fitting that this opening service of the Council should be a memorial of God's servant, and of our Bishop, Alfred Magill Randolph, who, having finished his course here on earth, has passed to the higher ministry above, and is numbered with God's saints in glory everlasting.

And yet, my brethren, this service is not a repetition of the stately office which we read over the dead who die in the Lord. Rather it is a service of commemoration with its high note of praise and thanksgiving for the good example of the faith and fear, of the service and the love of him whom God has called to Himself.

We will gather at the table of our blessed Lord, and we will hear once more that marvelous Prayer of Consecration to which our Bishop's reading gave a rich and rare interpretation of the depths of the divine tenderness, and sounded the message of the blessedness of the sons of men, through the full, perfect and sufficient sacrifice, oblation and satisfaction of the Eternal Son of God. We shall emphasize that clause of the Creed.

"I believe in the Communion of Saints," and we shall bless God's Holy Name for the life and teaching which will long be an inspiration to the Church in Virginia.

If Bishop Randolph had lived until the last week of June of this year he would have completed sixty years in the ministry of our Lord Jesus Christ. He was ordained in the old Seminary in June, 1858. He was the last surviving member of his class. Among his fellow-students and intimate friends were Henry C. Potter, of New York; Phillips Brooks, of Massachusetts, and others, like Richards, of Rhode Island; Elliott, of Washington; Thomson, of China; Galusha and Walter Williams and Henry A. Wise, of Virginia.

The six decades of Bishop Randolph's ministry were full of change and seeming chance in the history of the State and Church. He lived through a war which tried men's souls. He heard the sound of the shells as they broke against his Church and his home. He served as a chaplain on the battlefield and in the hospital. He passed away in the very midst of a war fraught with great issues to the world. And yet, through it all, he clung to his unclouded faith in the eternal verities of God to the certainty of hope in the ultimate triumph of good over evil; and of the coming of Christ.

Bishop Randolph's ministry was markedly successful—even as men count success. As a young man he had charge of St. George's, Fredericksburg—an important parish. After a brief ministry, during the latter part of the war, in Halifax and Charlotte he went to Christ Church, Alexandria. He was still a young man when he became rector of Emmanuel, Baltimore. He was consecrated Assistant Bishop of Virginia at the age of forty-seven. He was honored with college degrees, with invitations to preach in the great cathedrals of England. He was known indeed as one of the most eloquent preachers in the Church. He was the honored friend of men distinguished in letters and government—and yet in spite of all if we ask what was the most marked trait of his character, the answer would be—his modesty, his simplicity, his absolute indifference, not to the duties or even the power, but to the mere trappings and dignities of his high and holy office.

Bishop Randolph was pre-eminently a pastor. I began my ministry as his temporary assistant in Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, forty-five years ago. I remember how his people spoke of him, of his presence in the sick room, in the house of sorrow, how they leaned on his love and sympathy and were solaced by his prayers. The memory of his pastorate I find in all the churches that he served. He brought into his office of a Bishop this pastoral power—this shepherd love for those who were committed by the Good Shepherd to his care. I find the memory of his visits, of the benediction of his prayers, of the sunshine of his humor, of the loyalty of his friendship, of his gentleness with children, in many of the sweet homes in this Diocese.

As a preacher he ranked among the first in our Church. He was ever learning, ever seeking to find richer treasures in the word of God, but ever clinging to the fundamental verities of the Christian faith. He had profound sympathy with those who wrestled with doubt, for he himself had faced the great problem of human thought and had fought for his own faith.

The one characteristic of his preaching was that it was concerned with the great things of God, with faith, with love, with hope, with service. He brought to his preaching the wealth of his reading—he was ever a lover of the best books—and of his artistic and literary culture—which was wide. These were used simply to illumine the truth of the living God.

He had a power of vocal interpretation beyond that of any other men I have known, which carried meaning, even when he was speaking of the mysteries of faith, to the humblest hearer. There were shades and tones of his voice which scarcely seemed to need the translation of words in order to carry the impression of reverence and of righteous scorn, of pathos and of pleading, of enthusiasm and of love.

I need hardly speak of him as a Bishop. He brought to his work a love of the Church in Virginia, which was interwoven with all the story of her past. Broad and catholic in his human sympathies—he was not only by lineage—but by every fibre of his being

A Virginian of Virginians. Kinsman and friend of General Lee, he was friend and fellow-citizen of high and low—of white and colored—of all who are the children of the Old Dominion. Only those who lived in the days of his early Episcopate, or only one like myself who has been privileged to take an humble share in the work, can truly estimate the labors which he willingly rendered in the service of the Church. He was genial, loving, sympathetic, but firm when principle was involved. He tried, and not unsuccessfully, to keep the Church true to the Book of Common Prayer, and to the traditions which our fathers brought from the Motherland of England.

Other men may have surpassed Bishop Randolph along the lines of the conventional work of the Episcopate. His gifts were largely the gifts of personality. His work is to be traced, not only in statistics and in the records of the Diocese, but in the influence of his character and inspiration of his spiritual leadership in the realization of his loyalty to Christ and his devotion to the Church. He will be remembered, not only for what he did, though the story of his Episcopate tells of growth and enlargement, but above all, for what he was. There was that difference between him and many others—which is the dividing line between genius and mere ability.

His last days were days of weakness and of pain. His last few years were years of failing strength, and yet he kept the Church that he loved in his heart and lifted up his arms in intercession for her weal.

His name, his life, the memory of his teaching and of his love will be abiding parts of our inheritance. He wrote with his life the first chapter of the History of Southern Virginia. It will ever be luminous and helpful to those who read it aright.

And who am I, my brethren, that I should take up his work? I wrote to him last November—and I wrote from my heart—that I wished for nothing more, to the end of my life, than to be his helper in the Lord. God has seen fit to order otherwise.

For nearly twelve years we have worked together, and there has been no single word of misunderstanding, no lack of love and sympathy on his part. The last time I saw him he put his arms around me and spake to me words so generous that I would not dare to repeat them here.

And now, in my weakness and unworthiness, I can only cast myself upon God's mercy—can only look to Christ for power and grace to do His work. I can only show my love to Him by feeding His sheep—by feeding His lambs. And then I look to you, my brethren, you men and women of this dear Diocese, and I ask you to help me with your love and sympathy—and with your prayers—to carry on the work which was begun in Southern Virginia, this part of God's vineyard, by one far greater and worthier than I.

For the memory and inspiration of the life and service of Alfred Magill Randolph, we lift up our hearts in gratitude to God!

LOCAL SOUTHERN SUPPORT OF NEGRO EDUCATION.

That the South is giving locally, and with increasing liberality, to negro public schools, and that the negroes themselves are giving out of their new prosperity, is shown by recent reports of the Jeanes, Slater and Rosenwald Funds.

Each of these funds is of Northern origin, indicating appreciation of the fact that adequate provision for negro education is a task beyond the unaided resources of the South. Each aids the public schools only in co-operation with the people of the locality concerned—the county board of education, and the white and colored population of the community.

The Jeanes Foundation

This fund supplies negro teachers of home and farm industries. This year two hundred and twelve of them supervise such teaching in 2,395 schools of two hundred and three counties in fourteen Southern States, including Oklahoma. One hundred and sixty-three thousand country colored children are thus being fitted for country life and homes. The foundation pays monthly about $4,500.00 for salaries, and the county boards of education pay $6,000.00 monthly.

The Slater Fund: The General Education Board.

The aid these give to local public schools for negroes, goes to fifty-four county teacher training schools in Southern States. Our State boards report 75 per cent of the teachers in negro country schools as deplorably unprepared; and these schools are to supply teachers with a thorough common school education, training in home and farm industries and some knowledge of how to teach what they know. The Slater Fund gives, this year, over $27,000.00 for salaries in these schools; the General Education Board gives $12,000.00 for building and equipment; and the fifty-four county boards of education give $132,000.00 for all purposes. As the economic and moral value of these schools becomes clearer the demand for them increases rapidly.

The Rosenwald Fund.

This fund is available for better country school buildings for negroes where county boards and the negroes themselves contribute a certain percentage of the cost. In the last year three hundred and twenty-eight such schoolhouses have been built in ten Southern States, at a cost of $392,000.00, divided as follows:

Rosenwald Fund	$ 96,841.00
Southern whites	125,781.00
Negroes	169,419.00

White aid is from two sources:
County boards of education	$ 89,331.00
Local friends of negroes	36,450.00

This kind of co-operation between the sections and between the races means increased efficiency and prosperity in the rural South, and better relations in all directions. It is encouraging to note the steady growth of this co-operation throughout our section.

It is not for me, who am ignorant and blind, to prescribe what measure of health is fit for me. If I cannot extend the sphere of my activity, I will at least endeavor, by Thy grace, not to neglect anything by which I can be useful. Far from me be all impatience and peevishness. I will endeavor to lessen the cares of my friends for me, and express to them my gratitude for all the concern they show me. The little good I can do, I will do with all the zeal of which I am capable. Though weak, I am not entirely destitute of strength; and in the exertion of my remaining strength I shall not be wholly useless. . . . Thou request from Thy creatures no more than Thou enablest them to perform. To be what Thou wilt I should be; to perform what Thou wilt me to perform—this is my duty, and my supreme felicity.—G. J. Zollikofer.

The Great Commission

From China.

Rev. Walworth Tyng, Changsha, district of Hankow, China, returned to his station after furlough in this country to find a serious conflict between the troops of the North and South Provinces raging in the neighborhood of Changsha. The Southern troops, he says, have never been satisfied with the results of the first revolution. The conservative North, which is also poorer and less populous, has always managed to keep control of the military ascendancy as one of the survivals of the Manchu rule. The army quartered in the Southern Provinces has been mainly a Northern army. The result has been the development in the South of a feeling very similar to that underlying the Boston Tea Party of Revolutionary fame. This has produced a series of revolts since 1911, to secure the reality of the results aimed at in the revolution of that year.

"All the mission compounds, including ours, are a mass of humanity, mostly women and children. There are only a few of our men to manage affairs. These Chinese workers of ours are doing the job very well. We must have at least three or four hundred women and children from outside. The floor of the church even is covered at night with sleepers, besides schools, verandas and all other sheltered spaces.

"We have a month's supplies of food and fuel in our boys' boarding school and have arrangements for feeding the people. There is something very pathetic in their fears. We had to disappoint them in one respect: in refusing to allow valuables to be stored on the premises (so as not to tempt the looters in and jeopardize lives).

"The city has hardly a vestige of 'business as usual.' It is like a Sunday morning in some of the 'down-town' districts at home, with an unwanted and oppressive hush, but here with the added tension of many possible dangers, such as fires and looting. We could see the smoke of one of the barracks going up this morning, just outside the east wall.

"There are a good many new buildings here in the last nine months. The American consulate is in good new quarters on the river front. The fine new Yale Hospital is finished and in operation. My own house not being open, I spent my first night there as a guest of Dr. Hume in one of the private rooms for foreign patients. The Presbyterians keep on building, the latest being a boys' boarding school, a native pastor's house, a foreign residence (the third) and the big new church, besides a start on a large new school building for the girls' high school. They have only been here for four years (to our sixteen), and have nowhere near the opportunity of our wonderful location, but they have put in about four times the plant we have, and keep about double our staff. This is going on, war or not war, and is a possible basis for some comparisons not pleasant to realize."

While in this country last winter, Mr. Tyng, with the approval of the Board of Missions, asked for $18,000 for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings in Changsha. Towards this amount gifts and pledges total approximately $9,000. At its meeting on May 8th, the Board of Missions appropriated $4,500 from the undesignated legacies for Changsha. The Board of Missions will gladly receive and add to the Changsha Building Fund any gifts on account of the $5,000 still needed.

Presbyterian Home Missions.

The Home Missions Boards, among them the Presbyterian, report their big task to be the maintenance of the morals of the people in accordance with the appeal of President Wilson. Especially in the Middle West and in the mountain regions of the South, these societies are undertaking to explain to the people why taxes are high, why food must be conserved, why young men are drafted, and why some men must die that democracy may live. Especially in the foreign born sections of large cities systematic educational work on these lines is being prosecuted by direction of the missionary societies.

Speaking of the competition of war appeals with missionary money appeals the financial men of the Presbyterian Home Board say that churches as such are responding as liberally as ever to the regular causes, but that individuals are shifting their gifts. He estimates that twice as much effort is now required to get a dollar as was needed two or three years ago.

The Board in question, handling upwards of $1,000,000 a year, reduced its expenses last year as compared with the previous one. According to its report, just made public, Presbyterian churches gave to Home Missions $143,000 more than the year before, but because of heavy falling off in legacies it adds to its debt this year $120,000. At the beginning of the war this Board's receipts were $1,381,000, and in 1916 they were $1,065,000, but the year just ended they were only $869,200. In spite of its difficulties the Board announces that it is increasing its work in the country and in the cities in support of President Wilson's policy of mobilizing all people to help win the war.

Given; Not Lost: A British soldier invalided home with his arm amputated at the shoulder, it is related, refuses to let any of his friends refer to his having "lost an arm." Says the soldier manfully, "I did not lose it; I gave it."

It is the man who has consecrated himself to an unselfish use of all that he is and all that he has, who can see any part of himself or his possessions taken for the benefit of that cause and still feel no sense of loss. In place of lamentation for what he is deprived of, he is conscious of a pridelike honor in what he has been enabled to contribute to the purposes that seem to him worth more than his life.

In this high mood the word of Christ saying, "It is more blessed to give than to receive," rises into a mystic significance, cleared completely from the suspicion which among the selfish and uninspired treats it as a fanciful paradox. When one's giving, either of himself or what he has won and earned, becomes to him a title-deed of comradeship in the mightiest things that God is seen doing among men, then the joy of bearing a share in making the world better and mankind happier appears more than worth any price that it costs. The blessedness of giving is for those from whom nothing can be taken away because they have already dedicated everything.—The Continent.

There is no lifting power in the life of any man who performs his religious duties with the air of a tired man at work.—Ex.

Church Intelligence

American Church Building Fund Commission.

At its meeting on May 16, held at the Church Missions House, New York City, loans amounting to $21,900 were voted to the following parishes and missions: St. Mark's Church, Troy, Alabama; Christ Church, Tyler, Texas; Church of the Heavenly Rest, McCall, Idaho, and St. Thomas' Church, Denver, Colorado. Gifts amounting to $4,500 were voted to the following parishes and missions: St. Peter's Church, Seward, Alaska; Church of Our Saviour, Akita, Japan; St. Mark's Church, Jackson, Mississippi; Indian Mission Church, Fort Hall, Idaho; St. Agnes' Chapel, Brooklyn, New York; Bishop's Residence, Topeka, Kansas; St. Augustine's Church, Raleigh, North Carolina, and St. Andrew's Church, North Cramer Hill, New Jersey. Grants amounting to $1,500 were voted to the following parishes and missions: St. Paul's Church, Clinton, Oklahoma; St. Mark's Church, Mesa, Arizona, and St. Timothy's Church, Brighton, Colorado.

The Corresponding Secretary of the Commission, the Rev. Charles L. Pardee, is, as usual at this time of the year, visiting Diocesan Conventions, Councils and Convocations, explaining the work of the Commission and expressing its willingness and desire to assist in the work of construction of churches, rectories and parish houses. A tour of the Southwest has been accomplished, and another to the Northwest will shortly be undertaken.

Bibles For Midshipmen.

On the eve of their graduation from the United States Naval Academy to enter the great war, about two hundred midshipmen Sunday night, June 2, received Bibles from the American Seamen's Friend Society, 76 Wall Street, New York.

In the presence of several hundred friends and relatives gathered in Bancroft Hall, Dr. George Sidney Webster, Secretary of the Society, explained that this was the forty-sixth presentation of its kind, and that the fund which made possible the gift was in memory of General Emory Upton, for whom the great national army camp on Long Island is named.

This year the distribution to the one hundred and ninety-nine graduates was as follows: One hundred and sixty-five copies of the American Revised Version, twenty-four copies of the Roman Catholic Version and four Old Testaments and six copies of the Friendly Year, a book of quotations from the works of Dr. Henry Van Dyke, now a chaplain in the navy, which was compiled by Dr. Webster.

In the number of years during which the Bible presentations have taken place, the Bibles have been retained by the officers through their upward climb in the navy, and now they are said to be the treasured possessions of several rear-admirals.

This ceremony is one of the most unique in the history of the Naval Academy year.

Commencement General Theological Seminary.

The numbers were not large as compared with other years in the procession which left the library and went along the pathway to the Good Shepherd Chapel of the General Seminary, on the occasion of the commencement exercises on May 29. Twenty-seven men were graduated, coming from nineteen Dioceses, two districts in Canada and one in Japan. Bishop Lines, of Newark, presided, and the degree of Doctor in Divinity was conferred upon the Rev. Edwin A. White, of Christ Church, Bloomfield. The same degree was voted by the trustees to the Bishop-Coadjutor of Central New York, but not conferred because Bishop Fiske was unable to be present. Nine men received the degree of Bachelor in Divinity.

It is stated that some changes have been made in the work of the Seminary in order to save expense, the changes rendered necessary by the reduction in number of students. It is feared by many heads of seminaries that the shrinkage will be greater next year than this year. The trustees voted to grant the use of the rooms in one of the halls for war purposes should they be needed.

The commencement exercises of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge, Mass., will take place on Wednesday and Thursday, June 12 and 13. On Wednesday, Alumni Day, the sermon will be preached by the Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, D. D., and the commencement sermon will be preached on Thursday by the Very Rev. H. E. W. Fosbroke, D. D.

The Annual Convention of the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses will be held in New York, June 9-12, the services being held in St. Stephen's Church, Sixty-ninth Street. A special service of the New York Branch for the admission of members and associates will be held in St. Stephen's Church, Sunday evening, June 9, at eight o'clock, when several brief addresses will be made. On Tuesday, June 11, St. Barnabas Day, Holy Communion will be celebrated at eight and eleven o'clock in the morning. The business meetings will be held on Thursday.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Annual Council.

The twenty-sixth Annual Council of the Diocese met in St. Paul's Church, Lynchburg, Va., Tuesday, May 28, with Morning Prayer at 7:30 A. M. At 10 A. M. was held a memorial service for Bishop Randolph. This was most impressive: fifty of the Diocesan Clergy, vested, formed in the Parish House, and led by a large choir, proceeded up the central aisle; singing, "Ten Thousand Times Ten Thousand." After the Ante-Communion, Bishop Tucker, the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D., and Judge Leigh R. Watts, made addresses on the life, ministry and influence of Bishop Randolph.

Bishop Tucker's words were most touching, as he spoke of his noble life and ministry of sixty years, and said that he was the last of his graduating class, and had served through the Civil War. He was counted, as men look upon a man's life, as a successful man. Not only was he a minister, who "like a true shepherd loved and watched over his flocks, but was a hospitable, chivalrous Virginia gentleman, a true servant of the great things of God—faith, love and charity, which were the embodiment of his whole life."

The Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D., of Petersburg, and Judge Leigh R. Watts, of Portsmouth, gave an outline of the boyhood days of Bishop Randolph and spoke of his gifts as an orator. When General R. E. Lee heard him make an address at college, he predicted for him an enviable career.

The Bishop called the Council to order for organization and business, at one o'clock. A full attendance of Clergy, and for these strenuous days, a fair number of the Laity, answered to the roll call.

Arrangements were made to adjourn the Diocese's Council to-night, Wednesday, May 29, so that the clergy and delegates might return to their homes in time for observance of the fast day.

Upon a memorial which came up from the Convocation of Southwest Virginia, it was resolved, "That a committee be appointed to secure data and consider the feasibility and advisability of dividing the Southern Diocese along such lines as the Council in its wisdom shall deem it best."

Bishop Tucker appointed the following as the committee to consider the matter: The Rev. Messrs. F. H. Craig-hill, J. B. Dunn, D. D., F. A. Rich, C. B. Bryan, D. D., J. Cleveland Hall, D. D., Herbert N. Tucker, John F. Coleman and Messrs. C. Edwin Michael and W. E. Mingea.

The Bishop also appointed the Rev. Messrs. D. W. Howard, D. D., E. Rufin Jones, E. W. Cowling, W. H. Brown and Messrs. W. W. Old, Jr., and F. H. Wilcox to consider that part of the Bishop's address in which he referred to a Bishop Coadjutor to assist in the work in the Diocese. The Committee on Division will act, and report at the next Annual Council. The committee, on the Bishop's suggestion, as to a Bishop Coadjutor, reported, and the Council voted to petition the Church for permission to have this election at the next Annual Council.

The Rt. Rev. William C. Brown, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Virginia, honored the Council with his presence; and Tuesday afternoon made an earnest, strong appeal for Stuart Hall, the Church school for girls, Staunton. Bishop Tucker had also given this matter a prominent place in his report.

The Rev. M. P. Porter, spoke for the American Bible Society, and this object was ordered placed on the list of those for which offerings would be taken.

The question of the change of time of meeting, of the Annual Council of the Diocese, which was referred from the last Council, was taken up and warmly discussed. Many were in favor of the present time in May, but the majority voted to change the time to the third Tuesday in January. This waits to be confirmed at the meeting in May, 1919.

The Rev. George Floyd Rogers, of the Industrial School and Farm for Homeless Boys at Covington, gave a report of the work which was being done there. He said that one thousand boys for the last year had asked admittance into the Home, and made a strong appeal for finances to furnish the new cottages, which, he said, would accommodate two hundred more boys.

Rev. E. P. Dandridge reported for the Social Service Committee.

Much valuable work is being done, especially in relation to army camps and cities, connected therewith. A resolution of thanks and appreciation, and hearty endorsement for the men doing work in the camps, was adopted. The following was also adopted: Resolved, That the Council of the Diocese, request the Bishop, to appoint a War Work Commission of five, to hold office for the duration of the war, whose duty it shall be, to devise and recommend to the Bishop, and Clergy, and Laity of the Diocese, ways and means, by which this Church can more effectively do its duty, to the men of the army and navy, and to communities effected by war conditions. On motion, J. P. Knapp was given privilege of the floor and spoke of the work of St. Andrew's Brotherhood in the camps. Dr. Steinmetz spoke of the splendid work which was being done amongst the sailors at the naval base hospital.

The Rev. E. R. Carter read a report from the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, in which he stated that the work of the churches, Sunday-schools and colleges had been greatly affected by the war. The women, he said, have to fill the places of the men and, laboring under such strenuous conditions, are unable to do Sunday-school work. Many, he said, have given up their classes in the Sunday-school to younger, inexperienced teachers. Great emphasis was laid upon the need of the Summer School to be held at Lynchburg, June 17-21. Also institutes and other means to aid in preparing teachers, and building up the schools.

Another feature in the report of the Committee on Constitution and Canons was that the Diocesan Board of Missions, be the Central Missionary Committee to be Auxiliary to the General Board of Missions. This was adopted by the Council as follows: The Diocesan Board of Missions shall constitute a Central Missionary Committee, Auxiliary to the General Board of Missions, and it shall be the duty of the Central Missionary Committee to co-operate with the Men's Missionary Committee in the general parishes and congregations—to co-operate with the Provincial Secretary and the Provincial Standing Committee on Missions. That there shall be in each parish a Men's Missionary Committee appointed annually by the rector, or if there is no rector, by the church wardens, and there shall be a similar committee in each mission station, appointed by the minister in charge. It shall be the duty of the Men's Missionary Committee in each parish or congregation to co-operate with the Central Missionary Committee of the Diocese; especially towards enlisting the support of every individual of the parish, in the missionary work of the Church.

There was a canon proposed, to bring the Convocation in canonical connection with the Council, but this was objected to on the grounds that these Convocations were doing good service, as constituted, and in regard to the Convocations, the following resolution was adopted: That hereafter the Deans of the Convocations be requested to present reports of work in the several Convocations to the Annual Council of the Diocese.

By standing vote the following was adopted, and the secretary was directed to send it by wire to the President:

"The Diocese of Southern Virginia, of the Protestant Episcopal Church, in Council assembled, desire to express to the Chief Magistrate their continued and sustained confidence in the wisdom and lofty purposes of the nation in its participation in the great struggle, to emphasize the worth of the individual and to establish the liberty of every man. Believing that patriotism is ever in danger of becoming a ruthless thing unless it cherishes a redemptive purpose for the race in the midst of its desire to be true to its own ideals. All thank God, and take courage in the knowledge that America is pledged to share its priceless possession of liberty with all men of good will."

The following were elected for the ensuing year:

Secretary of Council—The Rev. William A. Brown, D. D.

Members of the Standing Committee—The Rev. Messrs. J. Cleveland Hall, E. B. Dunn, D. D., C. F. Smith, and Messrs. W. C. N. Randolph, D. A. Payne and H. D. Tyler.

Deputies to the Synod—Clerical, the Rev. Messrs. O. W. Howard, D. D., J. C. Hall, E. B. Dandridge, R. C. Jett, D. D. Lay, Messrs. T. S. Davant, C. S. Hutter, W. W. Old, Jr., and F. W. Darling.

Supplementary Deputies—The Rev. Messrs. J. W. C. Johnson, James S. Russell, D. D., F. C. Steinmetz, S. T. D., J. F. Coleman, and Messrs. H. B. Hodges, C. E. Michael, C. L. Mosby and G. L. Hume.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Grace Church, The Plains, the Rev. E. L. Woodward, M. D., rector, will be consecrated by Bishop Gibson on Friday morning, June 28. Bishop Brown will administer the Holy Communion, and the Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., will preach the sermon.

The Rev. W. R. Mason, rector of Christ Church, Charlottesville, will also have charge of St. Luke's Church, Edge Hill, and the Chapel of St. James, Owensville.

The Rev. C. A. Langston, of Ivy Depot, has accepted a call to Christ Church, Gordonsville, Epiphany Church, Somerset, and Barbour Memorial Church, Barboursville.

The Rev. Roger Walke, in addition to his work at St. Paul's Memorial Church, University, will have charge of the Chapel of the Good Shepherd, Forest Lodge Chapel and Grace Chapel, the missions served by the Rev. B. D. Tucker, Jr.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Council.

The forty-first Annual Council of the Diocese was held in Zion Church, Charles Town, May 29 to June 2. The opening service was held on Wednesday morning when the Rev. Dudley Boogher, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Parkersburg, preached, after which Holy Communion was celebrated. On Thursday morning the preacher was the Rev. G. C. Ravenswood, and on Friday morning the Rev. W. Hobson, of Bluefield. On Wednesday evening a service was held in the interests of Diocesan Missions, addressed by the Rev. J. T. Carter, of Clarksburg, and the Rev. S. Roger Tyler, of Huntington. On Thursday evening the Rev. L. N. Caley, D. D., of Philadelphia, spoke on Sunday-school Service. On Friday evening the Rev. Charles E. Betticher addressed the congregation in the interest of General Missions. The closing service of the Council was in charge of Bishop Gravatt, the sermon being delivered by the Rev. Hugh Birkhead, D. D., rector of Emmanuel Church, Baltimore.

Business sessions of the Council were held each day in the afternoon, and on Thursday, Friday and Saturday in the morning, and luncheon served at one o'clock in the Parish House.

The twenty-fifth annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in the lecture room of the Presbyterian Church on Thursday, May 30.

After again carefully considering the advisability of entering the Third Province, it was unanimously decided to do so, and four clerical and four lay delegates were chosen to represent the Diocese at the Synod. The recommendations and good wishes of friends interested in the welfare of the Diocese with reference to entering the Province were much appreciated by the Bishop and members of the Council.

Archdeacon B. M. Spurr earnestly presented the need for increase in the salaries of Diocesan missionaries and others dependent on the Diocesan Mission Fund, and steps were taken by a committee appointed, to increase to $1,200 all who have not hitherto been receiving as much.

The chairman of the Committee on Religious Education read a communication from the General Board requesting that the Diocese of West Virginia assume a stated portion of the funds needed for efficiently carrying on the work of the Board. The treasurer of the Diocese was instructed to act accordingly.

The Council was well attended by both lay and clerical delegates.

Closing Exercises at St. Hilda's Hall.

The meeting of the Council and the commencement exercises of St. Hilda's Hall, Charles Town, took place the same week, thus giving the Clergy of the State an opportunity to see something of this new Diocesan school. The growth of the school has been very gratifying to those interested in it and its future, despite war times, seems bright.

The Rev. R. E. L. Strider preached the baccalaureate sermon on May 26, developing with great force and directness his theme, that God is the directing power in our lives, and it is only through giving them to Him that success, in whatever sense you take it, may be attained.

The graduates held their class day exercises on Thursday afternoon on the lawn. Here the intimate words of fun and farewell were said to schoolmates and faculty and an English ivy planted for remembrance. In the exhibition of the art students' work, which was open throughout the week, one noticed especially the manual arts department—the skill with which color and design had been adapted to material deserves mention. On Thursday afternoon an informal reception to the Council was followed by the recital of the vocal graduate, Miss Janie Bushong. Miss Margaret Hester gave several interesting piano compositions, and the chorus class sang with excellent harmony and control Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave."

At nine the same evening the school gave "Endymion," a Greek play, which had been planned as an open air performance. As the weather prevented the open air setting, Cadmon Hall was made into a spring time forest, and the Greek maidens, youths and dryads danced and sang with an unconsciousness that made amends for lack of space and special lightning. The theme of the play—the power of love through self-sacrifice—was developed by charming lines and situations.

On Friday morning the students marched into Cadmon Hall singing, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," pledged the American flag, and sang "America." Bishop Gravatt, after a few appropriate prayers, addressed the graduates on the meaning of the student to the school, emphasizing the fact that their lives were living epistles. The Bishop then delivered the diplomas, and left for a meeting of the Council. Miss Duval presented the distinctions to students who had reached ninety per cent in any subject, and the Sarah Dandridge Cooke Scholarship to the girl making the highest average in all her studies. This honor went to Miss Serena Dandridge Pendleton, a charter member of St. Hilda's. The school then marched into "Whitby," where the "Link," which was placed in the chain on "Founders' Day," was closed, thus symbolizing the closing of the school year and the link with the past.

The graduates presented to Miss Duval a banner to hang on the walls of Whitby in memory of the class of '18. The services were closed with the benediction from the rector of the school, the Rev. J. S. Alfriend.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop.

The Annual Council.

The thirty-fifth Annual Council of the Diocese of East Carolina was held at St. John's Church, Wilmington, the Rev. R. E. Gribbin, rector, the Rev. J. H. Taylor, minister-in-charge, Tuesday, May 21, and Wednesday, May 22. The meetings were characterized by a harmonious spirit, and the reports on the state of the Church in East Carolina were most gratifying.

The Council was preceded by a preliminary meeting in the interest of religious education on Monday evening. The speaker was the Rev. L. N. Caley, of Philadelphia, and he had a large and interested congregation.

The Council was organized the next morning at 10:30, preceding the opening service, which was a celebration of the Holy Communion with the Bishop as celebrant. His charge to his Clergy and people was most helpful and inspiring, especially in these war times.

Tuesday evening there were interesting addresses by Mr. John G. Bragaw, Jr., a layman of Washington, N. C., and by the Rev. A. R. Parshley, a deacon who has been on the Y. M. C. A. staff at Camp McClellan, Anniston, Ala., but who expects to enlist as a private.

One of the unforgettable addresses made during the Council was delivered by the Rev. W. H. Milton, D. D., of St. James' Church, Wilmington, during the business session Wednesday afternoon, in which he stressed the importance of an optimistic outlook for the future of the Church. The service Wednesday evening was a splendid conclusion for the Council. The preacher to the large congregation present was the Rev. Robert W. Patton, D. D., Secretary of the Board of Missions in the Province of Sewanee. He placed the success of the Church's mission in the world as one of the fundamental things at issue in the war.

Co-incident with the meetings of Council, the Woman's Auxiliary and Parochial Society of the Diocese held their Annual Convention in the Parish Hall. One of the speakers to address them was the Rev. L. A. Peatross, returned missionary from the Diocese of Kyoto, Japan.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. M. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Diocesan Council: The twenty-third Diocesan Council of the Diocese met in Calvary Church, Ashland, the Rev. George H. Harrison, rector, on May 28. Organization followed on the morning of the twenty-ninth, after the celebration of the Holy Communion, with the election of the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, rector of Trinity Church, Covington, as Secretary, and the appointment of the Rev. Henry P. Manning, rector of Trinity Church, Danville, Assistant Secretary. The regular routine business was interspersed with the Bishop's annual address, dealing with matters of both Diocesan and general interest; the special evening services, with addresses upon the demands and effects of the war upon the Church, the call of the times for church extension and religious education and church unity, also the special service of intercession on May 30, in accordance with the proclamation of the President, for which service the Council adjourned that morning. Bishop Burton conducted the service, having set forth a special form, in which place was given for the reading of the proclamation.

Amongst the recommendations of the Bishop of the Diocese were those looking toward a larger Episcopal Endowment Fund, the preparation of an abstract of Diocesan and general canons relative to the duties of vestries and church committees, improved requirements concerning the preparation for and admission to the ministry, the regulating of the pruning of communicant lists, and larger support for the missionaries in the domestic fields.

Bishop Burton announced the work amongst the deaf mutes of the Diocese at a standstill, owing to the recent Provincial organization; the mission at Somerset revived; and the approaching appointment to the office of general missionary of Mr. W. B. Dern, soon to graduate from the Virginia Seminary.

Interesting reports were received from the Diocesan Social Service Commission, St. Andrew's Colored Kindergarten, St. John's School at Corbin and Margaret College at Versailles, all showing great progress.

The Rev. C. L. Pardee, D. D., Corresponding Secretary of the American Church Building Fund Commission, addressed the Council upon the work of the Commission, and offered its aid in the erection of buildings and in the making of certain kinds of repairs.

A special meeting of the Council will be called in the fall to consider certain important matters that will demand attention at that time, and which cannot wait until the next regular Council.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of St. Augustine's School.

St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, a Normal School and Collegiate Institute for the colored youth, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary the week of the twenty-third of May.

The commencement feature began with the closing exercises of the primary school. The children commended themselves admirably. Much credit must be extended to the teachers for their untiring efforts in making the program a success.

On the 24th, a full house witnessed the annual oratorical contest for a prize of $10 which is given by the Rev. M. A. Barber, of Christ Church, Raleigh. The rector spoke highly of the speeches, which showed depth of thought and the result of good training. The prize was awarded to Lester Clark, who spoke on "The Patriotism of the Negro."

A mystery play entitled, "The Little Pilgrim and the Book Beloved," was rendered on Sunday by a group of church girls under the auspices of the Guild of the Daughters of St. Mary.

Before one of the largest audiences gathered to hear the commencement sermon, Archdeacon Delany, Suffragan Bishop-elect, preached a jubilee sermon in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of the school.

Monday, May 27, was the closing exercises of the literary societies. Dr.

Charles Victor Roman, of the Meharry Medical College of Nashville, Tenn., was the speaker of the evening. Dr. Roman was introduced by Dr. Edson E. Blackman, a graduate of St. Augustine's, and delivered a stirring address on "The Purposeful Evolution of Things." He impressed upon the members of the society that there was a purpose in everything that happened or existed. The fact that we do not see it, does not mean that it does not exist or that it is "purposeless."

The musical program took place on Tuesday evening, May 28. Numbers were creditably rendered from the leading composers. The success of the program was due to Miss Julia Delany's faithful work.

A pageant showing the growth and development of the school during its fifty years' of existence, was held under the direction of Miss Eliza Baker, on the campus of the school Tuesday afternoon. Before the pageant, an "Ode to St. Augustine's," written by Miss Eva Burrell, was recited by Mary Jackson.

A historical sketch of the school, telling of the founding and development was read by Mrs. Roxanna L. Rich, a member of the class of 1906.

Following the historical presentation of facts, the pageant showed what the school is doing to-day. Grammar grades, high school and college departments showed the scope of work done.

On Wednesday morning, Dr. A. B. Hunter, the honorary principal, delivered the graduating address, in which he gave an interesting history of the school. At this exercise, four graduates received their diplomas.

Pleading for that pride of race whose absence has so deterred the progress of the negro, Robert R. Moton, principal of Tuskegee Institute, with a forceful address closed Wednesday night at the City Auditorium the great event of the school. The speaker was presented by Governor Bickett.

Bishop Darst, of the Diocese of East Carolina, a member of St. Augustine's Board of Trustees, made a short address emphasizing the sinfulness of waste and telling the students something of their responsibility to the less educated members of their race.

For the alumni spoke Principal S. Atkins, of the Slater Normal of Winston-Salem.

The program came to a close with the benediction by the Rt. Rev. Joseph B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop of North Carolina.

The school this year has had a total enrollment of four hundred and seventy-three.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Robert S. Coupland, D. D., rector of Trinity Church, New Orleans, has left for France to take up his duties as a chaplain under the Red Cross in the hospitals just behind the firing line. His orders stated that he would be on duty "twenty-four hours a day," indicating that he will be subject to call at a moment's notice to attend the bedside of the sick, the wounded and the dying. The vestry has granted Dr. Coupland a year's leave of absence, and has unanimously extended a call to the Rev. Walter B. Capers, D. D., to serve as locum tenens during his absence.

Dr. Capers for the past twelve years has been President of the Church Institute at Columbia, Tenn., and for six years was rector of St. Peter's Church, Columbia. During the past winter, owing to the absence of the rector, who has accepted the position of chaplain at Camp Shelby, Dr. Capers was in charge of Calvary Church, Kentucky. The degree of Doctor of Divinity has recently been conferred upon Dr. Capers by the University of the South, Sewanee.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

The Church of the Ascension, Claymont, the Rev. J. Gibson Gantt, rector, for many years a quiet suburban church, is rapidly undergoing a change. Almost at its doors the great industrial steel works of the Worth Brothers will be in operation, employing thousands of men. Within half a mile the chemical company is building a model city for its thousands of employees. Large estates have been sold for building purposes. To meet this call for increased service of the church, its members have responded generously.

A new and large Haskell organ is given by the children of the late Mrs. Emma Lodge, who for fifty years sang in the choir of the church.

Mr. F. C. McClure, of McClure and Harper, architects, has had the walls and ceiling of the chancel beautifully decorated. Largely, through the gift of Mrs. P. Frank Peters, the church is fully wired and furnished with electric fixtures. The lecture rooms have been turned over for the use of the Claymont Branch of the Red Cross, which the rector organized a year ago.

In many ways, the Church of the Ascension is facing the most important call for service of any other parish outside of the city of Wilmington, and town of New Castle.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Clerical Union: The May meeting of the Clerical Union was held out of town this year, taking place at Christ Church, Greensburg, on Monday, May 27. There was a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Bishop of the Diocese, followed by a business meeting, at which the annual election took place, the Rev. L. F. Cole, of the Church of the Incarnation, Pittsburgh, being elected President, and the Rev. S. H. Bishop, Secretary-Treasurer. After luncheon, served by the ladies of the congregation, the Rev. R. E. Schulz, of St. James' Memorial Church, Pittsburgh, read a paper on "Social Service," a lively discussion ensuing.

Trinity Church, Pittsburgh: During the week following Trinity Sunday, this parish lost two of its prominent lay members, Mrs. Harry Darlington and Mr. Edward T. Dravo. Mrs. Darlington was prominent in church, civic and patriotic work in the city. Her son and only child, is serving in the United States Army in France. Mr. Dravo was senior warden of the parish, vice-president of the Board of Trustees for the Diocese, and held many positions of trust in financial and philanthropic institutions. He was in his eighty-third year, and was able to attend to business up to within a week or two of his demise. His funeral took place at Trinity Church on Memorial Day.

Memorial Day Observance: In obedience to the proclamation of President Wilson, and in conformity to a Pastoral Letter issued by Bishop Whitehead, services were held in most of the churches in Pittsburgh and throughout the Diocese on Memorial Day. Many of them took the form of celebration of the Holy Communion, while others were services of intercession at various times in the day.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

The Archdeaconry of Harrisburg met in St. Mary's Church, Waynesboro, on the evening of May 23, after having dined together through the courtesy of the congregation. At the service of the evening fifteen adults were confirmed, some of whom came from Blue Ridge Summit, all presented by the minister in charge, the Rev. Frederick A. Cook. In place of the sermon by the Bishop, which usually follows the confirmation, each of the Clergy present spoke briefly congratulating the congregation upon the completion of the new and handsome church building, and the payment of all indebtedness upon it.

On the following morning the church building was consecrated. The sermon was by the Rev. George I. Browne, rector of St. John's Church, Lancaster. In the communion service the Bishop was assisted by the Rev. Leroy F. Baker, General Missionary; the Rev. H. B. Pulsifer and Rev. Robert B. Galt. At the luncheon which followed a resolution was passed thanking Mr. Karl B. Keferstein, of Blue Ridge Summit, for his generous aid to this congregation.

In the afternoon of the same day the members of the Archdeaconry, the choir of St. Mary's and many of the congregation went in automobiles to Emmanuel Chapel, Mont Alto, and there the Bishop blessed a portrait bust of life size of Bishop Henry C. Potter, who, as a student in the Seminary, acted as lay reader in this chapel by appointment of his father, Bishop Alonzo Potter. The bust was presented to the chapel by Alonzo B. Potter, Esq., son of Bishop Potter. On this occasion the formal presentation was made by the Rev. Alan P. Wilson, minister in charge, and was formally accepted by Bishop Darlington. One person was confirmed here. Directly after this service the party proceeded to the Mont Alto Sanatorium, four miles up the mountain, where one person was confirmed, and at the invitation of the Board of Health of the State of Pennsylvania inspected the tuberculosis camp, the chapel given by Mrs. Dixon, wife of the late Health Commissioner of the State, the new house for our chaplain, and other buildings in this large and complete sanatorium.

New Mission: On June 9 next Bishop Darlington is to open formally a place of worship in Knoxville in the northern part of the Diocese. A room has been secured and properly fitted up for worship, and the work is to be under the charge of the Rev. Guy F. Caruthers, D. D., now rector at Westfield. It is to be known as the Chapel of the Holy Spirit.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convention.

The forty-seventh Annual Convention of the Diocese was held at Trinity Church, Pottsville, the Rev. Howard W. Diller, rector, on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 28 and 29. It was the briefest session held in many years, and the number of lay delegates in attendance was rather small. There was no contest for any office, as only enough men were nominated to fill the various positions, and the Secretary cast one ballot, electing all. The result was that no afternoon session was necessary on Wednesday.

The Convention opened with a service at Trinity Church on Tuesday evening, when Bishop Talbot delivered his annual charge. The Bishop took great pride in the splendid response of his people to the call for funds for the Church War Commission, which asked for $12,500, and received very nearly $19,000. The charge contained an earnest plea for more contributors to the Bishop's Church Extension Fund, which now supplements the $12,000 expended by the Board of Missions for salaries of Diocesan missionaries, with about $5,000 annually for the purchase of sites or the erection of churches, rectories or parish houses. The Bishop also urged a continuation of the effective work of the Church to help the nation win the war, especially in the campaigns for the Liberty Loans, War Savings Stamps, Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. etc.

Immediately after the service the Bishop called the Convention to order in the Parish House. Mr. David J. Pearsall was re-elected Secretary, and the Ven. H. E. A. Durell was re-appointed Assistant Secretary. The following were elected members of the Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. James P. Ware, William B. Beach, John H. Griffith, Walter Coe Roberts, Stewart U. Mitman and Messrs. F. M. Kirby, Edward G. Mercur, Albert N. Cleaver, Joseph N. Welch, R. H. Patterson. The Rev. Robert P. Kreidler, chairman of the Social Service Commission, reported more than six hundred members of the parishes in war service, and all the parishes busily engaged in patriotic activities. Mr. Kreidler then proposed resolutions against profiteering, in favor of food conservation and in favor of the conservation of children. All the resolutions were adopted without debate.

Bishop Talbot celebrated the Holy Communion on Tuesday morning and called the Convention to order. The canons were amended so as to abolish the Committee on Adjustment of Difficulties, and to require three women on the Social Service Commission. Mr. Rodney A. Mercur, chairman of the Finance Committee, reported a cash balance in the hands of the Treasurer of $574.52, and recommended that the salary of the Bishop be increased by $1,000 annually. The recommendation was adopted by the Convention. Mr. Leonard Peckitt moved that the Convention through its Secretary, recommend to each vestry that all clerical salaries be increased 10 per cent. The motion was enthusiastically carried. The report of the Board of Missions was read by the Rev. R. P. Kreidler. The motion of Archdeacon Coxie fixing the apportionment for Diocesan Missions at $12,000 was passed. Miss Laura E. Ruddle, Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary, addressed the Convention. Reports were presented as follows: For the Bishop's Church Extension Fund, by the Rev. A. H. Bradshaw; for the Board of Religious Education, by the Rev. Howard W. Diller; for the Committee on Italian Work, by Archdeacon Durell; for the Church Home for Children, at Jonestown, by Mr. D. J. Pearsall; for the Committee on Meeting Places for the Convention, by the Rev. Robert F. Kline.

Upon recommendation of the Committee on the Admission of New Parishes and Organized Missions, the Rev. Wallace Martin, chairman, three organized missions were admitted into union with the Convention, namely, St. George's Church, Olyphant; the Church of St. John the Baptist, Providence, Scranton, and St. John's Church, Glenburn, all three in Lackawanna County.

The Convention adjourned with the Bishop's benediction at 1:00 P. M., and the women of the parish served a delicious luncheon. The next Convention will be held at St. Stephen's Church, Wilkes-Barre.

St. Thomas' Church, Morgantown, during an unusually severe storm on Monday evening, May 27, was struck by lightning and burned down. Nearly all the furnishings were saved. St. Thomas' is one of the old parishes of the Diocese, having been admitted into union with the Convention in 1825. The Rev. William DuHamel is in charge, and while he was in telephonic communication from his rectory at Douglassville, the storm made it impossible for him to reach Morgantown until after the destruction of the church.

The Alumni of the General Theological Seminary in the Diocese of Bethlehem held their annual reunion in the Parish House of Trinity Church, Pottsville, on Monday afternoon, May 27. The Rev. Professor Ralph B. Pomeroy, of the Seminary, was the speaker. The Rev. Robert P. Kreidler, of Scranton, was elected President, and the Rev. Wallace Martin, of Tamaqua, was elected Secretary. The Rev. Howard W. Diller, rector of Trinity Church, entertained the Alumni at dinner.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Ordinations: Three students completing their studies at the General Theological Seminary this year have been ordained to the diaconate: Robert S. Hooper by Bishop Lines on Ascension Day at Holy Innocents' Church, Hoboken, presented by the Rev. G. Ernest Magill, the sermon preached by the Rev. Professor Francis B. Blodgett. George F. Collard, at Grace Church, Madison, by Bishop Stearly on Trinity Sunday, presented by the rector, the Rev. Victor W. Mori, with Rev. Professor Dickinson S. Miller the preacher; Peter R. Deckenbach by Bishop Lines at St. Mark's, West Orange, on Trinity Sunday, presented by the Rev. Dr. Frank B. Reazor, his rector; the preacher, the Rev. Professor Charles C. Edmunds. Mr. Hooper may take war work. Mr. Collard is curate at Hackensack. Mr. Deckenbach continues in charge of the services at Westwood and Norwood.

The confirmations in the Diocese in 1917 were 2,134, divided almost equally between the two Bishops.

Clerical Changes: The Rev. John D. Kennedy has taken charge of the church at Allendale; the Rev. Henry B. Bryan has become rector of Grace Church, Jersey City; the Rev. John V. Ashworth has charge of the church at Pompton; the Rev. Warren L. Rogers, of St. John's, Jersey City, has leave of absence for three months' duty at Camp Dix, and the Rev. Edwin S. Carson the same leave of absence from Ridgewood for duty at Camp Merritt.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

St. Andrew's, Fort Worth: The Rev. Edward Henry Eckel gave the observance of Whitsuntide in this parish an unusual character by two occasions in honor of the Bible. On Whitsuntide itself, after Evensong in the church, a large number of people repaired to the auditorium of the parish house, where Mr. Eckel delivered a lecture on "The Superiority of the Bible to Other Sacred Books," and incidentally the pre-eminence of Christ to the founders of the ethnic religions of the East; after which he exhibited about fifty volumes of Bibles and Bible apparatus from his private library, some of which he explained before giving the people an opportunity to swarm around the exhibition tables and examine the books for themselves. A Latin Vulgate of 1489, with hand-illuminated capitals in color, was the object of chief interest.

On the following Wednesday evening the exhibition was repeated after a series of addresses as follows: "The Bible and Judaism," by Rabbi George Fox, liberal Jew, and Rabbi Charles Blumenthal, orthodox Jew; "The Bible and the Roman Catholic Church," by the Rev. Robert M. Nolan, rector of St. Patrick's Church; "The Bible and Protestantism," by Dr. W. W. Barnes, professor of Church History in the Fort Worth Baptist Theological Seminary, speaking in place of Dr. L. R. Scarborough, President of the Seminary, whose duties at the Seminary obliged him to forego the delivery of an address prepared for the occasion; "The Bible and the Anglican Church," by the Rev. E. H. Eckel. Rabbi Fox also contributed some four or five books for exhibition and Rabbi Blumenthal exhibited and explained the use of phylacteries and a ram's horn. There was a large mixed audience, and a most amicable and edifying discussion of the Bible from the several viewpoints represented by the speakers.

Mr. Eckel has arranged for a week's exhibition of some of the chief books of the display in a prominent store window.

Besides an early eucharist on May 30th, appointed by the President as a national day of humiliation, fasting and prayer, Mr. Eckel has arranged an intercession service for the afternoon, when the G. A. R., Confederate Veterans, and other military bodies are expected to attend in force.

The Annual Council.

The service of intercession for the nation and Allies marked the opening service of the Annual Council of the Diocese of West Texas, which was held in Grace Church, Cuero, May 21, 22 and 23. The Rev. Dr. W. Bertrand Stevens, rector of St. Mark's Church, San Antonio, brought a clear, definite statement of what is expected of the Church in relation to the men of the army; the Church must do two things, send the men forth with her blessing, interpreted in its widest scope, and then when they return receive them with a religion which they can understand, a religion centering in Jesus Christ and containing the elements of zeal and sacrifice and service. Dr. Stevens speaks with authority by reason of his large and successful handling of the soldier problem in his parish and his association with the Red Cross work at the Base Hospital.

The business sessions of the Council moved with rapidity, and the reports of parishes and missions gave much reason for encouragement and thanksgiving. Progress was the keynote, with a feeling that the time is now ripe for concerted advance throughout the Diocese. The Clergy list shows thirty-six Clergy, a record for the Diocese. Five Clergy are serving with the colors, three of whom are in France. The three schools, St. Mary's Hall, West Texas Military Academy and St. Philip's Industrial School reported successful years in spite of many obstacles. The Church Pension Fund is well organized and in good working order, due largely to the efficiency of Mr. Herbert Spencer.

The Diocese has a large soldier population and the demand for the ministrations of the Church thus entailed is great. The Rev. Frank A. Rhea has recently come in as Diocesan chaplain under the appointment of the War Commission to succeed the Rev. Lee W. Heaton, who has become Archdeacon of the Diocese. The Rev. Dwight Cameron and the Rev. Francis K. Little are also serving as voluntary chaplains in the aviation camps. Miss Mae Marsh, representing the War Board of the Girls' Friendly Society, has been active in the Diocese, forming new branches. Through her efforts a Diocesan organization of the Society was formed at a general meeting of the Council.

The closing service was a mass meeting on Thursday evening, when the speakers were Mr. Walter Macpherson, Field Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew War Work; the Ven. Lee W. Heaton, Archdeacon of the Diocese, and the Rev. Mr. Richards, rector of Christ Church, San Antonio, and the much loved Bishop Johnston, who spoke in high praise of the work of Bishop Capers, and entreated the Diocese to further the efforts of their Diocesan.

The Rev. A. J. Gayner Banks has recently assumed the rectorship of Grace Church and adjoining missions. The members of the parish and of the whole community spared no effort in entertaining the delegates, and the social side of the Council was delightful. A reception was held for the delegates Wednesday evening at the home of Mrs. Otto Buchel.

The next Council will be held at St. Mark's Church, San Antonio.

Special Military Service.

Under the auspices of the Episcopal War Commission at Camp Custer, Mr. C. J. S. Williamson, Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, at the camp, and the Rev. William Heilman, chaplain, arranged a special military service at Trinity Church, Marshall, on Sunday morning, May 26. At this service the officiating Clergy, choir, organist and ushers were all soldiers from the camp. The service was inspiring, both to those who took part and to a congregation which filled the church far beyond its seating capacity. The sermon was preached by the rector of the church, the Rev. Albert M. Ewert, the services being conducted by Chaplain Heilman. After the services the soldiers were entertained by the ladies of the church.

Annual Convention—Extracts From Bishops' Addresses.

The seventy-ninth Convention of the Diocese convened in Christ Church Cathedral on Tuesday morning, May 28. Bishop-Coadjutor Johnson celebrated the Holy Communion. There was an unusually good attendance of Church people from the country districts. In his opening address, speaking of the war, the Bishop said: "We take no high-stomaching pride in the war. We make no boast of bravery for going into it. We have not gone into it to seize land or to get spoil or to make gain. Nor to vent spite or to appease anger or satisfy hate. No blot of selfishness or stain of sordidness defaces our flag uplifted on the battlefield. It is a war for the rights of humanity, for the sacredness of promises, for the supremacy of honesty and truth. We could not stand aside. We would not count ourselves out, whatever be the cost and hurt. The God of might and right will guide the issue and ensure the end." The Bishop spoke feelingly of the long and valuable services which had been rendered to the Diocese by Mr. Francis J. McMaster, late Chancellor, whose death occurred less than a year ago. "My confidence in him was unbounded. My love for him was warm and deep. My obligations to him were beyond count." As successor to Mr. McMaster the Bishop nominated Mr. George C. Hitchcock, a lawyer of St. Louis, and the nomination was later confirmed by the Convention. In furtherance of the Bishop's suggestion, the Constitution and canons of the Diocese were changed to make the Diocesan year conform to the fiscal year as determined by the General Convention. The Bishop alluded in his address to "a much disturbed public opinion throughout the Church touching the equities and the law in the matter of the accrued liabilities sum in the hands of the Church Pension Fund." On the floor of the Convention, subsequently, a Committee on the Pension Fund brought in a report expressing the confidence which Missouri has that the fund is being properly administered; which report was adopted.

The Bishop-Coadjutor, in his address, called attention to the fact that the Committee on Assessments would ask the Diocese this year for an appropriation of practically $13,000 for Diocesan Missions, as contrasted with the $9,000 which was asked for the year that the Coadjutor came to the field; the increase being accounted for by the fact that many new stations have been opened in the rural field, many Clergy of high efficiency have been added to the rural staff, and, because the cost of living has so much increased, the salaries are rightly larger than they used to be. Later in the session of the Convention the amount requested was voted with enthusiasm. The Coadjutor reported that gifts of kindly people within the Diocese for the help of his work were this year more than twice those of a year ago; notwithstanding the constant "drives" which are so generously responded to for the prosecution of the war. He reported ten new places of worship built in his part of the field in the past six years, "many of them very humble chapels indeed," forty-three congregations as compared with twenty-eight six years ago, where services are held and sacramental helps administered with regularity, though in some cases with infrequency. He predicted that there would be great difficulty in keeping some of these places on the map the coming year. "As we look this goodly company of Missouri missionaries in the face," said the Coadjutor, "we have a right to realize that there are heroes here as well as in Flanders and Picardy. No banners are floating over them, save the banner of God's love. There will be no decorations for bravery except the "Well done" of the Master when the fight is finished. Except for the fact that they come here to Convention once a year, the average active communicant of the Diocese does not know where these men are holding the

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

In the din and stress of war Social Workers and those who have the real interest of our country at heart cannot afford to overlook the defeat we have received at home in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in holding that the Federal child labor law is unconstitutional.

It is gratifying to note that the decision was very close, four judges out of the nine holding that the law should be enforced.

In our efforts to make "the world safe for democracy" we must remember that part of that program is to make this country safe for childhood.

This disaster at home will be like our reverses abroad and simply add impetus to our efforts to go forward to final victory. No doubt welfare workers will immediately begin the preparation of a new law to save the children from the maw of the factory.

It will be remembered by those of us who have watched with interest the advance of progressive legislation that the first income tax law met with the same fate, and was held unconstitutional by a five to four decision of the Supreme Court, but to-day that form of taxation is pouring millions of dollars into the United States treasury, and if President Wilson's recent recommendations to Congress are acted upon it will soon become an even greater source of revenue, so we do not need to despair of eventually providing proper protection for our children, but let us lose no time in gathering our forces and pressing on to ultimate success.

Few things are more inspiring than the figures issued by the National Red Cross, showing that the sum of $166,000,000 was contributed by 47,000,000 within the past two weeks.

Surely the spirit of giving is growing among our people, when almost half of the entire population, men, women and children, contributed to this glorious cause.

Protests against the wearing of mourning for those who give their lives for freedom are pouring in on every side.

First of all, that brilliant leader of Christian thought, Rev. W. Russell Bowie, rector of St. Paul's, Richmond, Va., urged its abandonment in a sermon which had wide publicity.

About that time, or just afterwards, a bill was introduced in Congress to accomplish this same purpose by a Federal law.

More recently still, President Wilson has added the weight of his approval to this movement by sending the following letter to Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, head of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense:

"The White House,

"Washington, May 22, 1918.

"My Dear Dr. Shaw,—Thank you for your letter of yesterday. I do entirely approve of the action taken by the women urging some such action on their part, namely, that a three-inch black band should be worn, upon which a gilt star may be placed for each member of the family whose life is lost in the service, and that the band shall be worn on the left arm. I hope and believe that thoughtful people everywhere will approve of this action, and I hope that you will be kind enough to make the suggestion of the committee public, with the statement that it has my cordial endorsement.

"Cordially and sincerely yours,

"Woodrow Wilson."

In an explanatory statement on the subject the women's committee says:

"For a long time the women's committee has been receiving letters from women urging some such action on their part. The determined avoidance of mourning by English women has been much commented on and praised. One woman who advocates this step has four sons in the service, one of whom has already been killed. She wrote recently:

"I know the costliness of such supreme glory and sacrifice, and have felt both the selfish temptation to hide my pain behind a mourning that would hold off intrusion and the inspiration and stimulus of keeping up to my gallant son's expectation that I should regard his death as a happy promotion into higher service. Patriotism means such exalted living that dying is not the harder part."

The patriotic and psychological motives for this action are evident.

As the President has said, we are engaged in a struggle of nations, and not merely of armies.

It is just as important to keep up the morale at home as it is in the camp.

The smile behind the lines will reach to the front trenches, and a cheerful letter is as much help to our boys as wholesome food and proper equipment.

The Church here, as always, can, and should, wield its influence. Let us remember, and take this opportunity of bringing to the attention of our Church people the words of our Saviour in His farewell address to His disciples, where, in speaking of His own death, he says, "If ye loved me ye would rejoice, because I said, I go unto the Father: for my Father is greater than I."

Does not our great Teacher with these words set Himself against the custom of wearing heavy mourning for the departure of loved ones and brand the cultivation of grief as a form of selfishness.

Suppose that some one we loved were to inherit great possessions, the only bar to their enjoyment, being that it necessitates his going to a far country, from which he cannot return, but where there are already many whom he knows and loves. Under such circumstances would we mar the joy of that inheritance by emphasizing and prolonging the pang of the separation?

After all, to the real Christian—

"What is death?

"Tis but a changing

By the Eternal God's arranging

From a lower to a higher,

From a coarser to a finer.

As we journey on."

We are glad to quote the following from a Richmond, Va., paper in regard to the Virginia School for Social Work and Public Health:

"The school is the only one of its kind in the South. It was opened October 1, 1917, and has accomplished striking results in its initial session. Dr. H. H. Hibbs, director of the child-helping department of the Russell Sage Foundation of New York, after a visit to the institution, said that he has watched developments in social work in the United States in recent years with keen activity, and that the school here has done in one year what other schools have required many years to do."

The South has been somewhat behind the rest of the country in giving attention to the scientific study of public welfare, and it is most encouraging to see that the one school established for this purpose in this region has met with such prompt success. It is sincerely to be hoped that persons all over the South will avail themselves of the opportunity offered by this institution to equip themselves with the necessary training to fill the innumerable positions which are daily seeking trained workers in these lines.

We rejoice to hear that the Diocese of Ohio has taken a positive stand on the subject of prohibition by the adoption of the following resolution at its Diocesan Convention:

Resolved, That we, the Clergy and lay delegates of the Diocese of Ohio in Convention assembled, do hereby declare that in our opinion the amendment should be accepted, and should receive the support of the Church.

This action met with considerable opposition, but was finally passed by a large majority.

Last year the Diocese of West Virginia, in its Annual Council, went on record as favoring nation-wide prohibition by adopting a strong resolution to that effect.

At a time when the conservation of every grain of wheat, barley or rye, and of every ear of corn is absolutely essential to the saving of the civilization of the world, it is difficult to understand how it is possible for any Christian or American organization, whether religious or secular can fail to support the prohibition amendment to our Federal Constitution.

Second Sunday After Trinity: The first lesson is the story of the dedication of the completed wall and of the appointment of singers to restore the musical worship as in the days of King David. The point of general and of everlasting import is the offering of sacrifices with great joy, "so that the joy of Jerusalem was heard even afar off"; although the fact that provision for the choir was followed by strict obedience to a law of God (13:1-3), should not be slighted. The New Testament selection carries us forward and upward into the true temple of God, into the Holy of Holies of which, the High Priest has ascended; and we are urged to take our place in true worship: "Ye also, as living stones, are built up a spiritual house, to be a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ." Moreover, the narrowness and exclusiveness of Nehemiah's time, necessary no doubt, under the circumstances, are in striking contrast with the extension of the blessings of Christ to the Gentiles. The royal priesthood (of the laity) is gathered from among all nations, and Christians are urged to win outsiders, through their own good works, that they may glorify God.

The point of contact with the Eucharistic services would seem to be mainly found in the gospel for the day, the parable of the great supper. The "elect race" of second lesson corresponds with the invited guests of the parable; while the calling out of darkness into His marvelous light of those who in time past had been no people, but were now the people of God, corresponds with the "poor and the maimed and the halt and the blind who are gathered to the feast.

The evening lessons were selected to bring out the protection of providence and the "fear and love" of God's Holy Name, prayed for in the Collect and suggested in both Epistle and Gospel (1 John 3:15, 20; Luke 14:24). The Prophet Isaiah, dealing with the crisis in Judah's history, in which they faced a conspiracy of the upper kingdom of Israel and Damascus against themselves, and when they were tempted to resort to human contrivances for help, to an alliance with Assyria, for example, and consulted necromancers instead of God for guidance, urges on them the fear not of Syria but of Jehovah; fear not the policy of frightfulness inaugurated by Syria, but "Jehovah of Hosts, Him shall ye sanctify; and let Him be your fear and let Him be your dread." Put your trust in God and in the revealed word of God. It is this same thought that our Lord deals with in the second lesson (which might well include verse 32, or even go on to 34). "Be not afraid of them that kill the body and after that have no more that they can do. Fear Him who after He hath killed, hath power to cast into hell. Yea, I say unto you, fear Him. But also, love and trust Him." "Be not anxious . . . Fear not, little flock, it is your Father's good pleasure to give you the kingdom"; not a sparrow is forgotten in the sight of God. Fear not: ye are of more value than many sparrows." (Note also Isaiah 8:14 and Peter 2:8.) What a message for a world facing German frightfulness and efficiency!

The week days lessons continue the Old Testament law in the morning, paralleled by experiences of the New Testament Church, and in the evening Proverbs develops the wisdom whose principle is the fear of the Lord, while the teachings of our Lord are full of warning and of comfort.

Note: Jesus was leaving Galilee finally before His death, after four evangelistic journeys to its people, one by His disciples. How He gives them one more message through seventy converts sent to the great harvest He saw. Following them, He travels slowly southward, through Samaria, arriving alone in Jerusalem at the Feast of Tabernacles (October, A. D. 29). Here he remained till after the Feast of Dedication (December 20, 29) (Ellicott, p. 236); and raising of Lazarus; when the authorities become so hostile He withdraws to Perea beyond Jordan. This miracle showed His equality with, and mission from God, a resurrection first-fruits.

He that thirsts and wants relief must come to Christ Himself. He must not be content with coming to His Church and His ordinances, or to the assemblies of His people for prayer and praise. He must not stop short even at His holy table, or rest satisfied with opening His heart to His ordained ministers. He that is content with only drinking these waters "shall thirst again." He must go higher, further, much further than this. He must have personal dealings with Christ Himself; all else in religion is worthless without Him. The King's palace, the attendant servants, the richly furnished banquetting house, the very banquet itself, all are nothing unless we speak with the King. His hand alone can take the burden off our backs and make us feel free. The hand of man may take the stone from the grave and show the dead; but none but Jesus can say to the dead, "Come forth and live." We must deal directly with Christ.—Bishop J. C. Ryle.

The thing that probably attracts the most attention from heaven is the love that God's children have for one another on earth.—Ex.

This is the chart by which he steered his soul.
Look, faintly marked in chapter, verse and phrase,
Lies his long course among the strange sea ways,
Traced tremulously on the well-worn scroll.

Here at this page he missed a treacherous shoal,
There by that parable he sailed aright

By this old prophecy's unflinching light,
In his frail barque outrode the storm's

Dim-read between the lines our eyes may

How once across the tempest to his call,
Walking rebellious waves, the Master

The ancient anchor of the Word of God.

Birds in the War Zone.

Now and then a few of us turn to speculate as to the fate of animals—wild and tame—in the stricken land of war. It would seem, to judge from the report of a writer in the London Spectator, that the birds, at any rate, manage to keep fairly happy and secure. It gives us, somehow, a sense of relief to read what this eye-witness has to say, and to realize that in a land where everything else is sad and changed, one phase of life manages to "carry on" with comparative serenity.

"I remember one night in particular," he says. "The moon was shining vividly bright, the shattered tree trunks looked fantastic and cast dense shadows upon the ground, while at measured intervals the guns boomed out slowly replying to the strafe of the German guns. A crested lark sang sweetly as if anticipating the dawn, while a blackcap in the withered sapling that screened our gun pit trilled forth his lay, punctuated by the boom of the guns beneath him. The effect was very quaint, as during each pause in the gunfire the blackcap's song echoed sweetly over the shell-riven earth. A German shell, better aimed than usual, scored a direct hit upon our gun, but the din of the explosion apparently did not trouble the bird, for he only fluttered away to the next sapling and continued his song.

"At another time, when billeted in a chateau surrounded by extensive grounds and an extremely green and smelly moat, I listened to a nightingale, thrush and blackbird piping for all they were worth, while not a hundred yards away the German shells were pounding to atoms some sheds and a barn.

"Even in the trenches the birds do not appear to trouble about the sounds of war, and the wire entanglements of No Man's Land are a happy hunting ground, and from a bird's point of view an ideal place for nest-building. Last year I found a blackbird's nest in a tangled corner, while at another corner a kestrel would perch and preen her feathers, utterly regardless of the flying bullets and shells. At another place we were much amused at nightly visits of a great brown owl. He would perch on a stump about four hundred yards behind the front trench, every now and then flitting about, seeking prey, but would always return to his tree. If snipers were busy he would reply to the whizz of the bullets by calling loudly. He never failed in this, yet the moan of a high explosive would send him hurriedly from the scene, only to return again when all was quiet.

"One bird manoeuvre is rather surprising. A company of small birds—sparrows, chaffinches and other members of the same family—may be feeding quietly in the road or around a barn, when suddenly they will fly up and scatter at right angles. For a second or two there is nothing to be heard, then the sound of a shell comes faintly. Now, what instinct had taught the birds to disperse and fly in this way from the direct path of a shell? In the early days of the war they were not so wily, or perhaps their hearing was not so acute, for sparrows would remain in the ivy covering a house until the shell actually exploded, then they would whirl out and upward like so many pieces of shrapnel. Other birds do not appear to have learned to do this, for in an orchard that the Germans were shelling the young swallows remained perched on the branches until the trees fell. Then they flew up and whirled about, actually hawking for insects over the ruins of their former roosting place. Yet the parent swallows were most anxious over the welfare of their young brood, and kept them together for a long time after they had left the nest. It is a wonder that they have not learned the danger that lies in the whine of an oncoming shell."

The Holy Name.

In the Collect for the second Sunday after Trinity, the Church sets forth for us a solemn thought that we cannot afford to pass lightly by. All of the Collects, in their golden course around the Church year, concern themselves intimately and sweetly with the needs of the Christian life, but in the whole circle none speaks more directly than the Collect in question:

O Lord, who never failest to help and govern those whom thou dost bring up in thy steadfast fear and love; Keep us, we beseech thee, under the protection of thy good providence, and make us to have a perpetual fear and love of thy holy Name; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

This might well be called the "Collect of reverence," since it has to do entirely with the duty of keeping God's holy name in fitting fashion. It is the poetic Prayer Book version of the austere third commandment, the stern "Thou shalt not" of the decalogue recast into the form of a tenderly beseeching prayer that is none the less potent because of its tenderness and grace. The word given from Sinai is prohibitory and awful, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," and it carries with it a righteous threat,

"the Lord will not hold him guiltless." The Collect sweetly assumes the affirmative and at the same time intimates a precious promise: "O Lord, who never failest to help and govern those whom thou dost bring up in thy perpetual fear and love, keep us . . . under the protection of thy good providence, and make us to have a perpetual fear and love of thy holy name." Yet, though the two differ in diction and in form, they ring with the self-same clear, admonitory note—the unalterable duty of man to reverence his Maker's name.

It has been said that the crying sin of the present day is irreverence: a frivolous disregard for serious things—old customs, old ways, time-honored opinions. Certainly there has long been a marked laxness in the reverence accorded things sacred—particularly in the use of God's name. Irreverence is a suitable sin that masquerades under a hundred harmless guises. Often we do not even recognize it when we meet it. Yet the truth is that the line between blasphemy and irreverence is very faintly drawn; sometimes, indeed, it exists in the imagination alone. There are people who shrink from hearing an oath, yet who laughingly, or in a moment of irritation, make light and futile use of the great Name without any qualms whatever. They condemn too free a reference to the devil, yet ejaculate "For the Lord's sake!" whenever circumstances seem to call for a strong expression of the feelings. If they think of the matter at all they delude themselves with the argument that they have said nothing against the Name of God. "The Lord only knows!" comes glibly in answer to a passing question—and then, "Well, He only does know," the speaker appends, and goes his way, quite satisfied with his little sophistry. Another will listen pained to an opinion that contradicts Scripture, and later join heartily in applauding a so-called "Bible joke"—the little anecdote that, casting no aspersions whatever on the Holy Word, somehow makes light of it, uses it as a common thing, and—therefore—inevitably—detracts from the delicate honor that is its due.

Wisely does the Collect divide reverence into its component parts, "fear" and "love." Either alone would not make up the quality of reverence. If we refrained ourselves for fear, only, from the light use of God's Name, we are merely discreet and cautious, not reverent; if, on the other hand, we render His Name love without any admixture of awe, again we are not reverent. It is the blending of the two things that constitutes true reverence, that make our attitude toward Divinity "steadfast and perpetual."

It may be that the cataclysm of this war, which is shaking the spiritual as well as the physical world to its foundations, will give us a new standard of reverence. When the earth is quiet again, at last, and people take up their old ways, many little flippant references of former days will seem in bad taste, if nothing more. To some, indeed, they will have taken on a painful ugliness. The Name that went forth with our hosts, the Name by which thousands have died and thousands more have been abled, stricken, to live—it will not be any more a word to bandy about even in the best natured jest. It will have added holiness to holiness and strength to strength. We shall not, like the ancient Jews, take a new pen each time we inscribe the Divine appellation, but if our lesson is learned aright we shall name with new tongues, the Name that has kept us

"under the protection of its good providence."

Rumors and Ripples.

Mary Nelson Talbot.

Lelia Baird looked flushed and excited when she came in from school. "What do you think, mother?" she began. "I've heard a piece of news. Ned Frazier has been expelled from college for insubordination—what does that word mean?—and Mrs. Frazier is dreadfully upset, and so afraid his grandfather up in Eastville will hear of it. You know he was old Mr. Frazier's pet. And—"

"Wait a moment, dear," her mother advised, with a pained look. "You are talking too fast."

Lelia stopped awhile in her flow of information and fanned with her copy-book until she felt more comfortable. Mother sighed. "How sorry I am," she said. "Now, Lelia, the next thing for us to do is to keep this to ourselves. Whenever a piece of hurtful news starts, it widens and widens in rings, like a pebble thrown into a pond. You cannot tell how far the last ripple may reach—if there is any last ripple at all."

Lelia had opened her mouth to speak when little four-year-old Harry ran in. His damp curls were tumbled over his forehead and hanging in his brown eyes. Lelia caught him up. "Why, Harry, what are you holding so tight in your fist?" she said, as she clasped him. Her free hand prized open the little brown finger. "A nickel, I do declare! Where did you get it?"

"Picked it up," answered Harry, "in the road."

"Well, now, I came right along the road and didn't see it," his sister cried. "But, then, your eyes are nearer the ground than mine!"

"He hasn't been in the road except just in front of the gate," Mrs. Baird remarked, puzzled. She took her small son into her arms. "You didn't go away from the gate, did you, Harry?"

"No'm," said Harry. "Stayed in front of it, the way you told me, mommie. A lady dropped the money; I saw her. I picked it up when she went by."

"Why, mother!" exclaimed Lelia. "You know we've trained him better than that!" Her eyes flashed. "He isn't a bit bashful, and he's clever enough to know he could have called her back. Shame on you, Harry!"

Harry peered at her through his tangled hair; mother looked soberer than ever. "Who was the lady, son?" she asked gently.

"Don't know," replied the child, complacently. "She pulled her handkerchief out o' her bag, just so—he went through the motion—'an' wiped her eyes, just so. An' the money fell. An' I picked it up." His candid eyes were innocent of shame; the curly head nodded over on its well-beloved resting-place.

"I know!" Lelia put in here. "It was Mrs. Frazier and her sister. I overtook them and passed them in the road. I know, because—because—" she broke off suddenly, and looked uncomfortable.

"Mrs. Frazier was crying," she added hurriedly. "I looked back and saw her after I had passed, when I met Lucy Dean and was telling her about Ned. But, mother, aren't you going to punish Harry? I didn't think I had a brother that would take other people's property!" The hot tears sprang to her eyes.

"I don't think you have, Lelia," her mother said, somewhat sternly. "Harry, my son, why did you not give the nickel back to the lady who dropped it?"

Harry sat bolt upright, and his lip quivered. "She was so sad!" he cried. "She was wiping away tears, mother. I couldn't call her; I brought it to you."

Lelia threw her arms around the little body with repentant kisses. She was ashamed to look into her mother's face; but when she did, to her surprise, it was still very grave.

"Daughter," Mrs. Baird said, sending the small boy outside with his ball, "you accused your baby brother, hastily enough, of the sin of stealing. You are sorry for that, now, and we will forget all about it. But, my child, what fault were you guilty of when you overheard Mrs. Frazier's secret?"

"I could not help it!" Lelia cried eagerly. "They spoke so distinctly, and I could not well pass them in the narrow path."

"Yes; but, accidentally or otherwise, the knowledge became yours—and what did you do with it, Lelia? I would not have listened to the story at all, when you began, had I known how it got into your possession. Lucy Dean is only a child; doubtless a dozen more persons have already heard the pitiful secret. The ripples are widening. You surely did not think, my little girl. Was not this as truly theft as though you had taken Mrs. Frazier's money?"

Lelia bowed her head. "I see," she acknowledged. "But I ought to have seen first."

"We can take from our friends and neighbors things that are harder for them to spare than money or treasure," Mrs. Baird went on, "and it is just as truly dishonest. Always remember that."

"I will," Lelia promised gravely, "and now I'm going out to stop Lucy Dean's ripple, which is really my own, you know."

Familiar Hymns.

III. Abide With Me.

Abide With Me is chosen to be this week's "familiar hymn," as a companion-piece to last week's selection. When I Survey the Wondrous Cross—the other loving choice of the fighting men at the front. Abide With Me is of much more recent date than the former hymn; it is the work of a young Scotch clergyman, Henry F. Lyte, who wrote also our well-known "Pleasant Are Thy Courts" and other sacred songs. Like so many other deathless hymns, it is said to have been written in a time of great sadness of heart. Suffering from an incurable disease and about to depart for France, where he hoped to obtain relief, Lyte turned for consolation to the Source that had never failed him. Asking for pencil and paper he traced, in his weakness, the lines that have soled troubled spirits for all succeeding years. Surely it is more than mere coincidence that this cry of a heart on the eve of struggle and exile should be chosen in these strange latter days to voice the far-away soldier's passionate courage and faith.

It is plain that if the hymn commends itself to the ordinary Christian in any sad or turbulent phase of ordinary life, much more must it make appeal to the man at the battle front. Every line vibrates with a sense of the shortness of human life, the frailty of earthly joys and the sure hope of immortality. "I fear no foe with Thee at hand to bless," the fourth verse cries, and then, in triumphant challenge, "Where is death's sting?" The utter confidence of the final stanza is unshakable:

"Hold Thou Thy cross before my closing eyes,

Shine through the gloom and point me to the skies!"

There, in those conquering lines, we have the very essence of victory—the perfect overcoming of the last enemy of all. We have come to feel that hereafter, set to whatever tune and sung in whatever place, the old hymn will have taken on a new and solemn significance.

Abide with me: fast falls the eventide;
The darkness deepens; Lord, with me abide:

When other helpers fail, and comforts flee,
Help of the helpless, O abide with me.

Swift to its close ebbs out life's little day;
Earth's joys grow dim, its glories pass away,
Change and decay in all around I see;
O Thou who changest not, abide with me.

I need Thy presence every passing hour;
What but Thy grace can foil the tempter's power?

Who like Thyself my guide and stay can be?

Through cloud and sunshine, Lord, abide with me.

I fear no foe, with Thee at hand to bless;

Ills have no weight, and tears no bitterness.

Where is death's sting? Where, grave, thy victory?

I triumph still, if Thou abide with me.

Hold Thou Thy cross before my closing eyes:

Shine through the gloom, and point me to the skies;

Heaven's morning breaks, and earth's vain shadows flee:

In life, in death, O Lord, abide with me!

War Economy Corner.

Always Room to Save.

A famous New England housewife, Good Housekeeping tells us, had always managed her kitchen work with scrupulous economy, but with the coming of war times she has found still further opportunities for thrift. She describes a few of her new ideas as follows:

"I found, to my surprise, I could pare potatoes and apples even more thinly; I could bake potatoes in their jackets, and make these jackets edible by first scrubbing them thoroughly and then rubbing them over with a bit of suet so that after baking the skins are both tender and delicious in flavor.

"I am cutting the bread on the table; not a scrap is wasted. Crumbs are priceless in cookery.

"I am serving butter in smaller balls. The old size will make two of the new.

"Every scrap of trimming that the butcher used to be allowed as his own is now carefully wrapped with the meat I buy, and every particle of it is used. I use butter substitutes when not enough fat is accumulated in this way.

"I save the smallest portions of leftover vegetables, meat, bones, 'made dishes,' soups. They must all appear again in new guise.

"I put cold water in the container in which cereal is cooked, scraping every particle off later, then drain and add it to the next morning muffins. An

For the Southern Churchman. The Garden Party.

Anne Madison.

The lady lily gave a tea
One summer twilight hour,
And sent an invitation free
To every garden flower.

The table was a grassy rise,
With covers laid for twenty;
Accommodating fireflies
Provided light a-plenty.

A fat bee butler smartly dressed
In black, with golden banding,
Went back and forth from guest to guest,
Delicious dainties handing.

The food was candied honey drops
And dew of many flavors;
And poppy seeds and clover tops
Were what they had for favors.

Miss Rose was dressed in ruffled red,
Miss Primrose had on yellow;
Sir Sunflower at the table's head
Was quite a handsome fellow.

A wind came singing clear and free,
The wind of sweet June weather,
And all the flowers suddenly
Rose up and danced together!

For the Southern Churchman. How Rick Managed.

N. B. T.

When Rick Miller went over to the Grays' to buy some eggs he found Tiny Gray still tossing in bed, as she had done for so long.

"She don't get a bit better of the chills and fever," Mrs. Gray told Rick, sadly. "The doctor comes and goes, and he says give her soft, cool things to eat, but there's only one thing on earth she wants, and that she can't have."

Rick stood in the door and looked gravely at the big eyes and flushed cheeks of the little invalid. "What does she want?" he asked. "Can't I get it for her?"

Mrs. Gray sighed. "You couldn't to save your life," she answered. "Your ma ain't got the materials, and the folks that have got 'em ain't likely to worry themselves about Tiny Gray. Tell Rick what you're pining for, Tiny."

The little girl shut her eyes. "Ice-cream," she said, fretfully, and turned her face to the wall.

"That's it," her mother nodded. "That's her cry all day and all night."

Rick looked sorrowful; this was a hard wish indeed. "Doesn't she play with her pet hen any more?" he asked, hopefully. "It did seem that there must be something to give happiness to poor Tiny Gray."

"Not much," was the answer. "And when she begins to lose interest in that yellow hen, I am at my wits' end!"

Tiny opened her big black eyes. "Ice-cream," she said. "Cold and sweet, and a whole lot of it." She looked at Rick eagerly.

Poor Mrs. Gray threw her apron over her head with something like a sob. "If she wanted melted gold I could just as easy give it to her! But don't you worry, Rickie; it ain't nothing you can help."

Rick was thinking very hard. "I b'lieve I can manage," he said, briefly.

He hurried home to his mother. May I take my new wheelbarrow and see what I can do?" he begged, when he had told her about Tiny. "I won't ask for more than one thing at any one house. Just think, mother, Tiny's ice-cream is here in the neighborhood, all scattered around. If I can just manage to get it together!"

Mrs. Miller hesitated. She did not want Rick to bother his neighbors, but there seemed nothing else to do. The Millers had no cow, and they used a spring house instead of ice to keep things cool. "Well," she said, at length. "But it's a long, hot trip, son."

"I'll manage," Rick said. He filled his broad hat with green leaves, so that his head would be kept cool, and started off down the road with his new red wheelbarrow, a sturdy little figure.

Mrs. West looked doubtful when he made his request. "You're welcome to the ice," she said, "but all of the men are down in the hay field, and there's nobody to get it for you."

Rick felt that he could not let that stop him. With Mrs. West's permission, he took a pick and a hammer and went to the icehouse. It was hard to climb down into the dim, deep hole, but he reached the bottom safely. There was a good deal of straw to be pulled aside, and it took a long time to chip off the right amount of ice, and a still longer time to get it to the surface. But at length, panting and puffing, he lugged his burden to the wheelbarrow and, covering it with green branches and straw, set forth again on his journey.

It was a half mile to the Timms' farm, his next point, and the dust grew deeper and the sun hotter every step of the way. Rick was afraid to loiter, however, for fear the ice would melt. He was breathing hard when he met Farmer Timms at the yard gate.

"Milk to make ice-cream for a sick child?" the farmer repeated. "Well, sure, my man. But Mrs. Timms is sick, too, and the cook's away, and I'm a poor hand to tend to such things. Sit down and fan yourself while I see about it."

A moment later he came downstairs. "The missus says she won't trust me in her corks, but that she's always heard you were a careful chap, so you're to do the skimming yourself. And she says, take the top of the corks you skim. Poor milk makes poor ice-cream."

Rick was both proud and grateful as he made his way to the dairy. It was so deliciously cool out there that he longed to sit down for awhile, but he knew there was no time to lose. As the silver ladle slid under the great blankets of yellow cream he seemed already to see Tiny Gray's happy face. After he had mixed a large jarful of cream and rich milk, according to the farmer's directions, he packed ice carefully around it, and once more took up the handles of his wheelbarrow. It was hotter than ever now, and every rag of his clothing clung to his little body. "But I've got to manage, someway," he said to himself, and went creaking down the road toward Miss Betsy Bascomb's house.

"What's this?" said Miss Betsy, sharply, putting her head out of a back window. "Want a what? An ice-cream freezer? And what made you think you could get that here?"

Rick held his hat in his hand; the sun beat down on his little brown head. "If you please, ma'am—" he said, and went on to tell about Tiny Gray. "She craves ice-cream," he ended. "Her face is red with fever."

"Humph!" said Miss Betsy. She was a rather cross old body, and she made it a rule never to lend to her neighbors. But this boy seemed so sure he was going to get what he asked for. "Her face is red, eh? I hope it's not as red as yours. Well, well, I suppose if I must, I must. But it strikes me you might as well make the stuff here."

Rick trundled the wheelbarrow around to the kitchen, and in a short time they were both very busy. While Rick cracked ice, Miss Betsy did mysterious things with cream and sugar. Now and then she looked over her glasses to ask a question about Tiny.

"Likes hens, eh?" she repeated. "Well, if that's the case I'd just as lief use my chicken mould for the ice-cream? Ever see a chicken mould for ice-cream? Then just you wait!"

It was almost noon when Rick found himself ready to start again. This time the wheelbarrow carried a strange load. Inside a big lard tin was a large bucket packed in ice, and inside the bucket, on a flat dish, sat a wonderful ice-cream hen, with a red comb colored with vegetable coloring, and ice-cream wings spread above ice-cream eggs. Furthermore, she sat on a yellow gelatine nest, and her unwinking eyes were bits of clear ice.

"If only," thought Rick, seized with a sudden fear, "Tiny doesn't object to eating a hen. But there are the eggs, anyway!" He thanked Miss Betsy with all his heart. "No'm, I'm much obliged, but I haven't got time to sit down and eat any. You see, the hen might melt."

At last the long white road came to an end, and the red wheelbarrow, dusty and with blistered paint, stopped in front of the Gray cottage. Through the door came the sound of a fretful sob.

"Hey, Tiny!" cried Rick. He held aloft the snowy hen on her golden nest. Tiny sat up in bed and stretched out both arms. "You can't fool me," she piped, "it's ice-cream!"

When Mrs. Gray hurried out with a happy face and took the dish, Rick dropped in a little heap on the cool grass under a tree and fell instantly asleep. He did not wake until nearly sundown. Then he found Mrs. Gray standing over him. "You are a good boy," she said. "Tiny is better already. But, laddie, I'm so ashamed—there's not a spoonful left for you. She's eaten even the tail-feathers!"

Rick laughed as he stretched himself. "I don't care," he said. "I'm glad she did."

He went slowly home through the sunset. Mother met him at the door and heard all the story. "Well," she said, "you did manage, after all. And now, aren't you hungry, child?"

Suddenly Rick realized that he had had nothing to eat since breakfast, and that he was terribly thirsty, too.

Mother smilingly lifted the cover of a dish. A big mound of firm ice-cream came into view. "From Miss Betty Bascomb," she said. "Her cook brought it over, a little while ago, with a note. The note said that the laborer is worthy of his hire. Do you know what that means?"

Rick leaned back on the sofa and took a large, heaping spoonful of peach ice-cream. It seemed to him that he had never tasted anything so delicious.

"No'm," he said, "not exactly. But it must mean something mighty good."

The Summer Rain.

Falls swift and sweet the summer rain
Down from the deep sky silver-gray,
On scorching field and parching lane,
Meadow and brown highway.

In corners dry and dusty places
Sad flowers, shriveled with the sun,
Lift up their little wistful faces
And whisper, one by one.

The cool rain smites them lovingly
On brow and neck and cheek and chin.
They part their lips with a low cry,
And slowly drink it in.

"We were so tired of sun and heat,
So faint and thirsty!" they declare.
Oh, the fresh drops, the raindrops fleet,
'The blessed, blowing air!

They drink and drink; and when the showers
Are over, sounds a sweet refrain
From all the hearts of all the flowers:
"Thank God, for His good rain!"

I've thought of somebody—a young man. He was the son of a king, and had beauty and power and all that heart could wish, but he chose to rebel against his good father. His ambition was to be king himself. While he was leading an army against the royal army, his way took him through a thick wood, and there he met with a strange and terrible accident that resulted in his death. The father's love for the erring son was so great that he wept and mourned when the tidings were brought back.

Who was the young man?

The Little White Dog.

Marie Louise Doar, Aged 9, Summerville, N. C.

Once there was a little white dog named Peter Pan. He lived down town on Main Street. He minds the baby; when any one comes near he barks.

This little white dog is always kept very clean. He is the prettiest little fellow I have ever seen. He watches the people go to market, and everybody loves Peter Pan.

One day when the well was left open he jumped up on it, and what do you think he saw? Why, he saw another dog in the well. He jumped down and barked and barked. He wanted to tell his little mistress that a dog had come to see him. After that, he wanted the dog in the well to come and play with him. However, soon after that his people bought another little dog just like himself. Then Peter Pan was very, very happy.

Indian Children in Alaska and Wyoming.

We are hearing a great deal about children these days and perhaps we are most interested in French and Belgian and Polish orphans. I am going to tell you something about the children I have known in Alaska and Wyoming. When the babies in Europe are born they are put in a wooden or metal cradle, which perhaps with some of its furnishings has been handed down from one family to another for several generations. My little friends are received quite differently when they are ushered into this world. The Alaskan Indian mother makes a birch-bark basket, something like a chair, with a string of beads on the back which she jingles when baby cries, to attract its attention. Then she goes to the woods and finds a squirrel's nest. She takes it home, and after putting some fresh moss in the basket she uses all the soft material like down that Mrs. Squirrel had so carefully prepared for baby squirrel and tucks that in next. Over this she puts more moss, then bits of flannel into which baby is carefully seated. A blanket is pinned about its little body to keep it from falling out and the tiny tot is ready to receive visitors in a sitting posture.

Our western friends make a board into a papoose cradle for their babies. Skillful mothers with nimble fingers cover the whole board with beads in beautiful designs. Baby is dressed and his little body is bound tightly to the board; then the mother straps the board (sometimes almost as big as herself) to her own back and walks or drives about. I have often thought that sometimes she must forget baby is there, for the mother stops to talk to her friends keeping the poor little thing winking and blinking in the hot sun or she drives many miles in a wagon without springs.

The Alaskan father makes bows and arrows for his child to play with and to use in bringing down birds and rabbits until he is old enough to use a rifle. The boys are not so fond of shooting at a mark, but they like to see how far they can send the arrow into the air. Another sport is to see how far they can climb into the tallest tree they can find, tying a handkerchief to the twig to mark the spot. If a squirrel should happen to be lodged in the tree he knows no rest until he is secured by the youth who is climbing, surrounded by a dozen or more boys who cheer him on until the little animal is pocketed. I have often thought these Indian boys would make successful aviators if trained, they are so daring and courageous, knowing no fear. The more difficult the task the greater they welcome it.

In the spring of the year, when you are playing with tops, these boys are making whistles out of the branches from the willow trees. I have seen as many as seven whistles on one branch from each of which came sweet sounds.

Using birch-bark is another form of amusement. One day at Nenana, seated quietly writing, I heard a tramp of feet coming towards me. I looked out to see all the boys of St. Mark's School marvelously dressed in birch-bark. They had made coats, hats and all sorts of make-believe things out of it. The ones most disguised wore beards and mustaches made of a long moss found in the woods. They reminded me of gnomes we read about in fairy tales.

Are not Indian girls and boys very much like ourselves?—Margaret S. Grider, in Young Churchman.

The First Baseball Mitt.

Just where Spalding got the idea of the first baseball mitt may not be publicly known, but a writer in All Outdoors gives the following story of its origin. He says:

"About 1867-68, a baseball team came to Rockford, Illinois, to play our nine. They called themselves the Unconquered Clippers of Illinois, and plastered our town with big posters. We made up our minds to give them a drubbing, and at the end of the game the score was Rockford, 76; Clippers, 0.

"There was a little chap playing third base who grabbed everything that came near him, and held it, too. I noticed that he wore a kind of glove. When the game was over, I went to him and asked him what it was that he wore on his hand. He told me that he was a machinist, and had got his hand badly hurt a week before, and he showed me the wound in his palm. He said the boys did not want him to play in that game, but he got a piece of thin sheet steel and made it slightly concave, but so that it did not quite touch the sore place. He then made a short glove to cover all the hand excepting the first joints of the fingers, and doubled the leather in the palm so that he could slip the plate between.

"I asked him if it hurt, and he said it did not, and that he could take a hot one and hold it better with the glove than without. That is the whole story. I don't think that Spalding ever talked to the little chap with the iron fist, as the boys dubbed the third baseman, but everybody in Rockford knew about the mitt; and he may have got the idea from him. Anyway, that was the first glove that any ball player ever wore."—The Presbyterian.

How Lucile Helped.

The school room was very noisy. The children were moving their feet, turning the leaves noisily in their books, and some were whispering. Poor little teacher was so tired, she was almost ready to give up in despair! It seemed that none of the children loved her today, for, if they did, surely they would obey.

"Oh, if three o'clock would only come!" she sighed to herself, "so that I might let them all go to their homes and I might have a rest!"

She started down the aisle between the rows of seats to try once more to get the children quiet. Her heart was very heavy and tears were near to her eyes. As she passed one seat occupied by two girls, a little hand thrust itself out into the aisle and crowded a piece of crumpled paper into the teacher's hand. The teacher went back to her desk, unfolded the piece of paper, and read:

"Dear Teacher—I love you very much—Lucile."

When teacher looked up there were two bright tears in her eyes, but they were glad tears. When she spoke there was a new ring in her voice.

"Children," she said, and her voice was soft and low, "put away your books and let's sing a merry song."

And as the children sang, all of the trouble seemed to leave the room. Soon they went back to work, and all was sweet peace and quiet.

And as the children were leaving the school that day, the teacher looked into a pair of blue eyes and smiled. "I love you very much, Lucile," she said. —Child's Gem.

To be gentle and courteous, forgiving and self-effacing, to purge our hearts of pride and envy and greed, to suffer silently and without making reprisals, to put on bowels of mercy, meekness and gentleness—that is to put on Christ. It is not difficult to be stiff with pride, stilted with conceit, unapproachable in our haughtiness, swift in our counterblow. It is difficult to cherish in our heart the thought, "If I can keep one human heart from breaking, I have not lived in vain." But that is to mirror the King with the reed, and to be what God craves us to be.—W. M. Cloud.

"Give What You Can Afford and Then Double It"

Hard to Do Without It.

A man needs religion as he needs sunshine and fresh air and good food, and for somewhat similar reasons. He cannot be sound, and sane, and wholesome, and healthy without the one any more than he can without the other. The man to whom the Gospel means nothing tends to become a one-sided, unhealthy, ill-formed man. He has left something out of his life that sadly mars, and limits, and weakens it. He may not be a very bad man, but the thing he has left out lowers his ideals, narrows his outlook, perverts his ambition, spoils his happiness, and injures his real usefulness. It may not do all or any of these things completely, but it certainly does tend to do them all. Neither in ideals, nor vision, nor ambition, nor satisfaction, nor helpfulness is he the man he would be if religion was the big and vital thing in his life. Religion is a tonic, an inspiration, a stimulus, a bracer for life's duties, a solace for its cares and trials, a steady power all along its uneven way that no man can afford to be without.—The Christian Guardian.

Free men, who are here for the purpose of using their liberty, must and do make choice. Life's issues are not determined by hap or accident. Every man's destiny awaits his own decision. All that God can do He has done. The issues depend now upon us. We are surrounded with helps to the fulfilment of life's true issues. Have we made our decision? Are we intelligently and heartily on the Lord's side? That is the supreme question. Until it is answered we have done our duty neither to Christ nor to ourselves. We cannot be Christ's men without knowing it.—C. A. Berry.

Love: Joy is love exulting. Peace is love in repose. Long-suffering is love untiring. Goodness is love in action. Faith is love on the battlefield. Meekness is love at school. Temperance is love in training. Love is the greatest thing that God can give us; for Himself is Love; and it is the greatest thing we can give to God, for it will give ourselves, and carry with it all that is ours. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."—Selected.

Cut down your meat bills

You get so much more flavor, so much more tenderness in meat cooked in Pyrex that you can really enjoy the cheaper cuts—cuts that you never thought of buying before.

Science explains why two-thirds more heat goes through transparent Pyrex than through ordinary pans—why Pyrex cooks food more evenly, more thoroughly than any other pan.

Pyrex transparent oven dishes cook every food better. They bake bread an inch higher, give pies crisp undercrusts just like the top, keep cake from falling, make leftovers more delicious.

Dealers everywhere sell Pyrex. Pyrex will not break in the oven. Dealers are authorized to replace any dish broken by oven heat. Pyrex has the name on every piece. Try your first dish today. You will say you will never again use an old-fashioned pan.

Send Nuxated Iron to Your Boy in Camp

General Gibson Says No Fools that every Soldier Who Goes to the Front Should Take Nuxated Iron

Dr. James Francis Sullivan Explains Why It Helps to Increase Strength and Endurance and Build Up Weak, Nervous, Run-down Folks.

What every soldier most needs is tremendous "stay there" strength, power and endurance, with nerves of steel and blood of iron. To help produce this result there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron, says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly Physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. "I have personally found it of such great value as a tonic, strength and blood builder that I believe if General Gibson's advice were followed many of our fighting men would find it of great benefit. In my opinion there is nothing better than organic iron—Nuxated Iron—for enriching the blood and helping increase strength, energy and endurance."

General Horatio Gates Gibson says Nuxated Iron has brought back to him in good measure that old buoyancy and energy that filled his veins in 1847 when he made his triumphant entry with General Scott into the City of Mexico and he feels that every soldier should take Nuxated Iron.

Another remarkable case is that of General David Stuart Gordon, noted Indian fighter and hero of the battle of Gettysburg. General Gordon says: "When I became badly run-down this year, I found myself totally without the physical power to 'come back' as I had done in my younger days. I tried different so-called 'tonics' without feeling any better, but finally I heard of how physicians were widely recommending organic iron to renew red blood and rebuild strength in worn-out bodies. As a result I started taking Nuxated Iron and within a month it had roused my weakened vital forces and made me feel strong again, giving me endurance such as I never hoped to again possess."

Another interesting case is that of General John Lincoln Clem, who at the early age of 12 years was Sergeant in the U. S. Army and the last veteran of the Civil War to remain on the U. S. Army active list. General

I am a well man."

And then there is Judge Samuel S. Yoder, Statesman, Jurist and for 18 years a practicing physician—formerly Surgeon Major in the Army and now Commander in Chief of the Union Veteran Union, who says: "Nuxated Iron restores, revivifies and rehabilitates the system. To the man of 70 as I am, it is just as certain, just as efficacious as to the youth in his teens."

It is surprising how many people suffer from iron deficiency and do not know it. If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained.

Manufacturers' Note: Nuxated Iron which is prescribed by Dr. Sullivan, and which has been used by Generals Gibson, Gordon, Clem, Judge Yoder and others with such surprising results, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists and general stores.

appreciable amount is thus saved in a week and to the great advantage of the muffins.

"I save coal in my kitchen range by keeping the fire never higher than the lining. I never rake it down except when a hot oven is actually needed. And, finally, I shut it off as closely as possible when not in use. I find there is easily a difference of half a hod or more coal a day, when this care is taken.

"More than anything, I plan to save time, for in these days we should give every minute possible to helping supply our own dearly beloved soldiers and our Allies with the comforts and necessities they so sorely need. And, finally, I have enlisted the whole family as kitchen soldiers, too."

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

The Young Rose.

Out from a bare, green stem
Opened a rose.
Whence it sprang I know not,
Nor where it goes.

From the infolding dark Glowing it came,
As from the bush of old
Burst the live flame.

All I know can be told
Thus in a breath;
That to my soul is taught Disdain of death.

—The Century.

The Next Worse Life.

The preacher has a hard time. If his hair is gray, he is old. If he is a young man, he hasn't had experience. If he has ten children, he has too many; if he has none, he should have children, for he is not setting a good example. If his wife sings in the choir, she is presuming; if she does not, she is not interested in her husband's work. If a preacher reads from notes, he is a bore; if he speaks extemporaneously, he is not deep enough. If he stays at home in his study, he doesn't mix with the people; if he is seen around the streets, he ought to be at home getting up a good sermon. If he calls on some very poor family, he is playing to the grandstand; if he calls at the home of the rich, he is aristocratic. Whatever he does some one could have told him how to do it better. He has a fine time living off donations which never come in and promises that never mature. Next to being an editor, it is the most awful life.—Fayetteville Observer.

Sins of commission are the usual punishment for sins of omission. He that leaves a duty, may well fear that he will be left to commit a crime.—Gurnall.

RHEUMATISM AND INDIGESTION.

Practically all physicians and medical writers are agreed that there is a close relationship between indigestion and Rheumatism. This view is substantiated by the fact that Shivar Spring Water, which is probably the best American mineral water for Dyspepsia and Indigestion, relieves Rheumatism and the Rheumatoid diseases such as Gout, Sciatica, Neuralgia and Nervous Headache. All of these diseases are probably related and all are probably due in whole or in part to imperfect digestion or to imperfect assimilation of food. Physicians who have studied this water and who have observed its effects in their practice believe that it relieves these maladies by rendering the digestion complete and perfect and thereby preventing the formation of those poisons which inflame the joints and irritate the nerves, and also by eliminating, through the kidneys, such poisons as have already been formed.

The following letters are interesting in this connection. Dr. Crosby, a South Carolina physician, writes:—"I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of Rheumatism, Chronic Indigestion, Kidney and Bladder troubles and in Nervous and Sick Headaches and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time, will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the Liver, Kidneys and Bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter."

Dr. Avant of Savannah writes:—"I suffered for years with a most aggravating form of stomach disorder and consulted a number of our best local physicians, went to Baltimore and consulted specialists there and still was not benefited. I had about despaired of living when I began to use Shivar Spring Water and in a short time was cured."

Mr. Rhodese of Virginia writes:—"Please send me ten gallons of Shivar Spring Water quickly. I want it for Rheumatism. I know of several who were cured of Rheumatism with this water."

Editor Cunningham writes:—"The water has done more good than any medicine I have ever taken for Rheumatism. Am entirely free from pain."

Mr. McClam of South Carolina writes:—"My wife has been a sufferer from Rheumatism and after drinking twenty gallons of your Mineral Water, was entirely cured of the horrible disease."

Mr. Carter of Virginia writes:—"Mrs. Carter has had enlarged joints upon her hands, caused by Rheumatism. Shivar Spring Water removed every trace of the enlargement. The water is simply excellent."

If you suffer with Rheumatism, or with any chronic disease, accept the guarantee offer below by signing your name. Clip and mail to the Shivar Spring,

Box 64 D, Shelton, S. C.

Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Spring Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns which I agree to return promptly.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McA. Pittman.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The best remedy for a sick church is to put it on a missionary diet.Every dollar a worldling spends is an unanswered prayer for happiness.Many troubles are like dogs. Run from them and they will follow you; turn on them and they will fly.We understand why the vine is pruned, but we are much perplexed when we ourselves are being pruned.So long as we love, we serve; so long as we are loved by others I would almost say we are indispensable; and no man is useless while he has a friend.
—Stevenson.It is not in a man's creed but in his deeds, not in his knowledge, but in his wisdom, not in his power but in his sympathy that there lies the essence of what will last in human life.The moral law is written on the tablets of eternity. For every false word or unrighteous deed, for cruelty and oppression, for lust and vanity, the price has to be paid at last.—Froude.Be like the bird that on frail branches swinging,A moment sits and sings—They bend beneath him, and yet he keeps on singing,
Knowing that he hath wings.The truth that men are judged by their desires finds its highest illustration in Jesus. The perfection of His nature is shown in the perfectness of His wishes. When all His desires shall be fulfilled, then there will be nothing more in the universe to be desired.—
Phillips Brooks.Whether we climb, whether we plod, Space for one task the scant years lend—To choose some path that leads to God,
And keep it to the end.

—L. W. Reese.

Self-pity is deadly. Gas will warm and illuminate your rooms, but cease to use it for that purpose, and breathe its fumes, and you die. Pity is yours to bestow comfort and cheer upon others, but deflect it from that use and turn it upon yourself, and all your courage, strength and nobility of character will shrivel into weakness and selfish decay.
—Selected.Heart-keeping is much like housekeeping. There must be continual sweeping out of dirt and clearing out of rubbish, a daily washing of dishes, and a perpetual battle with all sorts of vermin. If heart-cleaning could be done up once for all, then the Christian might discharge all his graces and have an easy time of it.—Theodore L. Cuyler.Closing the heart against the cry of the needy is only another way of shutting the door of heaven against yourself.—Ex

The Hour of Prayer.

My God, is any hour so sweet,
From blush of morn to evening star,
As that which calls me to Thy feet—
The hour of prayer!Blest is that tranquil hour of morn,
And blest that solemn hour of eve,
When, on the wings of prayer upborne,
The world I leave.For there a Dayspring shines on me,
Brighter than morn's ethereal glow;
And richer dew descend from Thee
Than earth can know.No words can tell what sweet relief
Here for my every want I find,
What strength for warfare, balm for grief;
What peace of mind.Hushed is each doubt, gone every fear,
My spirit seems in heaven to stay;
And e'en the penitential tear
Is wiped away.Lord, till I reach yon blissful shore
No privilege so dear shall be
As thus my inmost soul to pour
In prayer to Thee.

—Charlotte Elliott.

We shrink from any precise or dogmatic statements concerning a future of which we know nothing. It is absolutely enough for us to believe that our future lot will more than satisfy us, even though our hearts were a hundredfold more exacting than the tenderest heart can be. The heart of God will be satisfied—that is enough.—

CHURCH INTELLIGENCE.

line. But they are holding the line, and for the same reason that men in khaki are holding it, to make the world a fit place to live in; to make this part of the world a safe place for the boys who are gone to the war to come back to when the war is won!"

The report of the General Board of Religious Education outlined a plan for an institute to be held during the coming winter. Bishop Tuttle will give a course of five fortnightly lectures on pastoral theology, and there will be five lectures to vestrymen by some conspicuous business layman of the Church. The report of the hospital missionary showed an increased staff and a vastly wider field covered. It is doubtful if the Church in any city of the Union reaches the down-and-out class more effectively than in St. Louis. The reports of St. Stephen's, Grace-Holy Cross House, the Woman's Auxiliary, the Girls' Friendly Society and the voluntary chaplain at Jefferson Barracks were all received with enthusiasm by the Convention. The Committee on Constitution and Canons didn't get its report in until the house was growing thin, toward the end of the third day. The committee had fair weather with its proposed alterations and changes until it came to a proposal to change the article of the Constitution providing for membership in the Convention. By constitution the Convention is now "composed of clergymen and laymen." The committee proposed that the membership should consist of clergymen and deaconesses and laymen; and that, in voting, a deaconess should be "considered as a clergyman."

After a debate, which added no little to the heat (although it was most good-natured throughout), of an already super-heated summer day, the resolution was defeated.

By rule of Convention, the second day is always given over in the afternoon to a discussion of missionary matters. This year adjournment was taken to the beautiful suburb of Kirkwood, where, at the newly acquired farm which will be converted into a Diocesan Convalescent Home, the good people of Grace, Kirkwood, served delicious refreshments. Later, at Grace Church, a missionary meeting was held, at which addresses were made by Dr. C. H. Shutt, hospital commissioner, of St. Louis, and Mr. Thomas Q. Dix, Secretary-Treasurer of the Country Convalescent Home.

Father and Son.

An old saying tells us that the boy is father to the man, or, to use another old adage, as the twig is inclined, the tree is bent. From the earliest efforts to give expression to the will power that God has implanted in each human being to the day when we leave this life, there is more or less development taking place within us. This, of course, is most rapid in the first twenty or twenty-five years of life; hence the emphasis that is placed on this period.

One great aim of all development is to produce a condition of self-control. In the lower forms of animal life this process is much more rapid than in the human being. The boy begins life in a condition of complete dependence. He has nothing to do with his coming into the world, and little control over the early years of his life in it. Little by little, however, he assumes control over his actions, and just in that same degree his parents find their control decreasing. Happy is that boy whose parents recognize the goal to be aimed at, and are willing to so regulate the extent of their control over him that his confidence and love may not be lost.

We hear a great deal about the boy problem. We do not hear much about the parent problem, and yet we are convinced that the solution of the former depends largely on the solution of the latter. It has been said, with a great deal of force, that "more parents have mastered the rules of bridge than have mastered the principles of child culture," and also that, if the average father "had given his business no more thought and judgment than he gave his son, he would be a financial bankrupt." It is a difficult matter for many a father to give the time that he should to his boys, but there are scores of fathers who prefer to shift the responsibility to someone else—to the mother, to the day school teacher, or to the Sunday-school teacher. And when this happens it means a serious loss, not only to the boy, but to the father as well, for the father needs the companionship, the friendship, the life and the point of view of his boy almost as much as the boy needs him.

One of the secrets of success in life is co-operation. The child is necessarily left largely to the care of its mother. In the case of girls, the mother's influence must always remain the predominant factor. In the case of boys, however, the father must exercise a steadily increasing degree of influence if he is to hold them. When the period of adolescence comes—the most critical in any boy's life—the average full-blooded boy begins to break away from his mother's leading-strings. The strivings of manhood have begun, and he is like a craft afloat on an open sea, exposed to all sorts of temptations and influences. It is at this time that he requires the patient, sympathetic anchor of a father's love and advice. The father has passed through this period himself. He should naturally understand the situation better than the mother, and unless he steps into the breach the boy is in danger of drifting and making shipwreck. Physical force gradually ceases to play an important part in this process, and the subtler and more powerful influence of fellowship or partnership takes its place. To belittle the hobbies, the adventures, the games, or even the love affairs of a boy is a serious mistake. It is better a thousand times over for a father to show a sympathetic interest in all these than to drive his boy to seek elsewhere the companionship he craves. A real partnership in all things, not only in those that more immediately concern the boy, but also in the daily occupation and interests of the father, is the key to the solution of the vast majority of the difficulties. Lead the boy, step by step, to grasp the meaning and purpose of life; that making a life and being of service to one's fellow-beings is of infinitely more value than making a living, or even a fortune. Let him into the secrets of your own daily life and interests, the difficulties you are facing, the opportunities for helping others that are presented to you, the disappointments and joys that you experience, and you will thereby strengthen his affection for you and fit him better for his own life's struggle.

Respect for others implies taking them at God's valuation, and they who see others as God sees them, speaks of them and to them in a different language.

There is more lost than is imagined by want of respect for the self which aspires, loves and thinks, which, though it is hidden, is the real self of all men. —Canon Barnett.

Germania, Germania, our pride of years ago:

What has changed thy kindly spirit;
what has led thee to act so?
From thy learning, light and leading,
thou art fallen very low.

We loved thee in the former days and wished our ways like thine.

Thy Science, Art and Song enwreathed thy brows with laurel vine:

But we now no more can follow thee and all friendship must decline.

Ambitious to be mistress of the world at any cost:

Thy treaties, conscience, honor: all to one side hast tossed:
Determined all should fear thee: the love of all hast lost.

Brave Belgium, Serbia, Poland and the nearest part of France;

Hast outraged, burnt and ruined by thy armies' fell advance:

While starvation, murder, rapine still afright the whole expanse.

Hadst paused? Armenia's children had not perished by the Turk;
Two million of earth's bravest youth had still been at their work;
Nor sailors drowned by hundreds where thy submarines still lurk.

Retrieve thyself, thy million dead cry
pleading from the sod;
Destroy thine own false leaders, and retrace the path now trod;
Democracy is calling: through Democracy speaks God.

This hour calls for religion. No immediate urgency for things, for supplies and arms and machines can mean that ideals and principles must stand aside and wait for quieter times. The outstanding things are seldom the most influential or important. The war will not be determined by things; it will be settled by motives, principles and ideals. The important consideration of this hour is that we shall think clearly and justly, shall have high vision and worthy motives, that we shall be controlled by religious ideals. Never was the message of religious education more timely.—H. F. Cope.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc. Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists. Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

THE SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN AND THE CHURCH PENSION FUND.

During the past winter and spring the Southern Churchman has discussed editorially the special claims of a small body of the clergy, the former pensioners of the General Clergy Relief Fund, upon the Church Pension Fund. We have pleaded for a generous consideration of their needs in the distribution of the surplus of the Initial Reserve Fund, and gave as strongly as we could our reasons for maintaining that a larger portion of this surplus might properly be devoted to their relief in these days of stress. No one has questioned that this is a legitimate subject for discussion in the Church press, nor that the many Churchmen whose views coincide with our own are entitled to a presentation of their strong convictions through that medium.

We should be very sorry indeed if the impression were left upon the mind of any of our readers that we have asserted or supposed that there has been any misappropriation or misapplication of the funds intrusted by the Church to the Pension Fund, or that we doubted either the great value of the Pension system or its able and successful administration. The single point on which we have ventured to differ with the Managers of the Fund is that indicated above, having to do with a preliminary and temporary problem and the interpretation of the terms of a trust, we advocating a more liberal policy and interpretation than they felt themselves able to adopt. We have never questioned the integrity of the Pension System nor its great importance to the Church. A great business enterprise fraught with the largest possibilities for good to the Church throughout future generations has been successfully inaugurated and is being conducted with the utmost efficiency. One can hardly overestimate the task that has been accomplished or the work that is being done. It remains that the Church in its every part give to the Pension Fund the hearty and systematic support which is its due; and we would urge upon every parish the necessity and duty of meeting its assessments promptly, for its own sake and that of the Church at large. An interest in the Fund for its rector or minister is now part of the obligations due him from each parish, and may be secured with the fullest assurance that it will be carefully administered and fully protected.

Because we are unable to see eye to eye with the management of the Pension Fund in regard to one or two details which have nothing to do with its main purpose, we are the more anxious that our confidence in the system itself and in its successful administration should be fully understood.

THE LESSON OF THE WAR CONCERNING CHURCH UNION.

The Council address of the always wise and thoughtful Bishop Burton, of Lexington, was largely on "The Lessons of the War." Our correspondent from that Diocese writes us that what he said on "Unity" stirred the Council greatly, and it was requested that it be given the widest publicity through the Church press. "The Council were unanimous and enthusiastic in making this request, feeling that it so splendidly represented their mind and would be a real contribution to the discussion throughout the Church on this very vital subject." The Bishop's explanation of the action of the House of Bishops on the Newman Smyth Memorial puts that matter in its true setting. He frankly states the difficulties confronting the Bishops and points the way to their solution as far as is at present practicable. Our readers will be glad to have us give way to our betters for the remainder of our editorial space.

Bishop Burton on the Lesson Concerning Church Union.

There is an aspect of organization which presses for most acute attention, namely, that by which it faces other organizations having the same purpose or end. After experiences in the trenches that have stripped religion of all but the fundamental realities; after being forced by the necessities of the case to accept the ministrations of another communion than that of their home-choice; after the recognition given to the Y. M. C. A. by the national government because the former presents a united and vast front to the work to be done; after witnessing the self abnegation of great nations, in consenting that their troops should be brigaded with those of other nations differing in governmental organization and political character; and after serving under a generalissimo that had supreme control of the whole allied forces, the choice of whom was decided on because of his military genius alone, methinks there will be millions of men, and women too, who will be, not only restless and impatient when confined strictly within the denominational corral, but who will be convinced that the forces of evil are only laughing in their sleeves at the futility of attacks upon them by a divided Christendom, constituted of variously organized bodies that indulge, as between themselves, in no little prejudice and contention. The question of Christian Unity and Church Union is the paramount practical one of the immediate future.

I stop here to refer to the action upon this subject at a recent special meeting of the House of Bishops, because of which the House has been the target of bitter criticism. I feel that this criticism proceeds from an unreasoning disappointment. The disappointment is natural; but circumstances should be considered. The Bishops met, at the busiest time of the Church's year, for two special purposes. These they accomplished, after most deliberate, yet intense, application, apparently to the satisfaction of the public. One of these was a most involved and vexatious subject. Not very long before the meeting the individual Bishops received a printed copy of a memorial from two distinguished Congregational ministers, which made a proposal that, by their own confession, "went to the very core of our existing disunity." This was "that a joint consecration and authorization should be given to the chaplains by both the Episcopal and non-Episcopal Churches." The memorial was referred to a special committee, which made its report late in the afternoon of the closing session, after a number of the Bishops had left, supposedly to return to their homes. I myself feel that, at this crisis in the world's affairs, involving so seriously the Kingdom of God, the Bishops should have felt that no diocesan engagements were so important or binding as to prevent their continuing in session as long as might be necessary to the fullest consideration of every pertinent subject that might be constitutionally before them.

So far as concerns the tone of the resolution, which has been complained of as cold and unsympathetic, every one acquainted with parliamentary assemblies is aware that the tone of a report is a matter of temperament and literary style on the part of those composing it, which it is very difficult to alter after the report has emerged from the committee that prepared it. But the essential thing to observe is that here was a proposition, that went to the very core of our disunity, which the House of Bishops, with no time for debate, was expected to adopt, or for it, to suggest a practical and satisfactory substitute, when the proposition has been the bone of ecclesiastical contention ever since the Reformation, and when the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order is taking years to make ready for its profound discussion.

The truth of the matter is that it was impossible for some seventy-five men spontaneously, on the spur of the moment, to assume the leadership on this subject demanded of them, when they represented among themselves schools of thought that radically differ on subjects pertaining to what we call churchmanship. It is better frankly to acknowledge the fact that on not one of all four of the points of the Chicago-Lambeth platform for unity are we in perfect agreement within our own household of faith. And, to be entirely straight-forward, had the majority of the House of Bishops committed themselves to the proposition of the two distinguished memorialists, the result would have been dissensions within the Episcopal Church, the noise of which would not have been drowned even by the roar of artillery and the clash of arms in the awful international war in which we are now engaged.

I have profound respect for the memorialists, and feel especially drawn to the Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth, and, as I said at the start on this branch of my subject, I believe that the times demand that we shall promptly arrive at a union between the churches that will end present competition and alienation. I wish also that our reply had been given a note of sympathy more satisfactory to the memorialists. But I owe it to the House of Bishops to declare that, after mature reflection, I cannot see that the proposition of the memorialists was a practical one.

The advice of the memorialists was "Do it first, and discuss it afterward," provided "it seems the right thing now to be done." But it was asked in the memorial that the House of Bishops should confer such orders as would satisfy those who "would not feel well assured of sacramental grace, unless the Eucharist were communicated to them by a presbyter who had been ordained by a Bishop." Surely the learned memorialists should have known that there is no ordination which the Bishops, as a House or as individual Diocesans, can furnish that would satisfy those in view by the memorialists except such an ordination as is hedged about by the constitution, rubrics and canons of this Church, and such as requires the co-operation of examining chaplains and standing committees.

The House of Bishops cannot precipitate the issue of corporate unity when it has been committed by General Convention to a Commission on Faith and Order. But I respectfully submit that it should be possible for the next General Convention to agree upon some proposition for a working union between the various evangelical communions, that will co-ordinate us all in a great movement for the redemption of man, for the Christianization of society and for the winning of the nations to a league of righteousness, justice, liberty and peace. And there is no subject to which the clergy and laity may so well devote their vigorous thought, their earnest prayers and their public service by speech and pen, from now on until the General Convention meets in 1919.

Meanwhile, in this Diocese we may do much to promote such a practical co-operation as will smooth the way for an ultimate corporate union. I have had, throughout my twenty-two years' episcopate, in the eastern half of Kentucky, an experience of friendliness and hospitality on the part of ministers and laymen of other communions that is almost without exception. And, speaking generally, this relationship was not merely a personal one, such as ought to subsist between gentlemen, however widely sundered in opinion, but also a courteous recognition of my office and an interested disposition to co-operate in my work. I believe that all of our clergy and the bulk of our laity in this Diocese go as far as canons and rubrics will allow, to sustain fraternal relations with our separated brethren; and I exhort them to make every possible advance to their brethren of other churches, and to encourage every approach to themselves that the laws of this Church will permit, with a view to mutual understanding and effective co-operation.

Christ's Challenge in This World's Crisis. By Geo. William Douglas, D. D., Longmans, Green & Co. 75 cents.

The great war in which we are engaged has brought forth many a protest against the growing materialism of the age. Like a true preacher of righteousness, Dr. Douglas, in a series of Advent addresses delivered in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, calls attention to the essential spirituality of human life, and shows that one of the results of the present crisis has been to bring out more clearly the old and familiar truth that "man cannot live by bread alone."

Human nature is made in the image of God and is capable of rising to sublime heights of self-sacrifice under the inspiration of a lofty idealism.

This is no time, therefore, for pessimism—as for lack of faith. There is a silver lining to the cloud, and the preacher finds it in the inherent nobleness of human nature and in the saving power of the gospel of Christ to meet and satisfy every human need.

The outcome of the present struggle is strikingly set forth in Raemaekers' picture of King Albert of Belgium confronting the German Kaiser.

The Kaiser, pointing to devastated Belgium, exclaims: "See, sir, you have lost your all." But answers King Albert: "No, sir, we have not lost our soul."

The sufficiency of the Risen Christ to satisfy the soul—to solve every problem which the war presents, the need of strengthening the spiritual foundations of democracy at home, are ably and eloquently set forth in this little volume.

With true prophetic earnestness the preacher does not spare the sins of his people. He cries aloud against the two twin social sins of intemperance and impurity, and bids us put our own house in order and keep our hands free from all dishonor before we dare to ask of God the victory.

Neither democracy nor America, he tells us, are going to be decisive in this war unless they have a humble mind and think soberly of themselves."

This volume of addresses, we feel sure, will serve to reassure the despondent and to strengthen the moral defenses of the nation at home.

UNITY AND VAGUENESS.

Mr. Editor:

I have just read an earnest extract from Bishop Lines' Convention Address, and the eloquent letter from Bishop Brent on Church Unity. Bishop Lines says, "The Church must cease to spend time on unimportant things." What these unimportant things are he does not specify, except to say, still somewhat indefinitely, "It is not a time for the Church to develop ecclesiasticism." Bishop Brent says, "Just as now is the time to strike for the unity of nations, so it is the time to strike for the unity of the churches. I wonder how many people at home realize that our chief difficulty in connection with the morals of the army is due to the divided Church." Later on he says, "It seems to me the time has come for us to do something daring and loving for the Kingdom's sake." What this something is to be he does not specify, except to propose a conference.

For twenty years there has been going on what may be called an acute discussion about Church unity, and so far as one can see there has been absolutely no progress toward any result. It seems to me that the cause of this failure of any result is the fact that the discussion abounds in vagueness, and that not one of the churches says plainly what it is willing to surrender, and what it will not under any circumstances surrender. No one will define what is or what is not an "unimportant thing."

Our Episcopal Church did indeed set forth the four points of the Lambeth Conference, and I believe the general understanding is that she still stands by these four points. If she does, then in all honesty, whenever she mentions the subject of Church unity or proposes a conference, she should say that any unity, so far as she is concerned, must depend on acceptance of the four points. Or will she surrender the fourth point, which is the real bar? I say the real bar, as it certainly is, unless she is willing to say distinctly that this fourth point does not carry with it the doctrine of Apostolic Succession, with what this implies as to the validity of orders. Is Bishop Lines ready to place this among the "unimportant things"? Is Bishop Brent ready to make this surrender as "something daring and loving for the Kingdom's sake"?

It has never seemed to me that actual Church unity is so much needed as practical Church co-operation, but if we are to strike for Church unity, let us quit vagueness, which may sound very beautiful but arrives nowhere, and adopt a daring definiteness, which will be less eloquent perhaps, but will at least bring us to some conclusion.

THE CHURCH AND THE WAR.

Bishop Beverley D. Tucker, Council Address.

The Church must do her full part in this time of need. But the question comes, what is the Church's part? What can she best do to stay and help and to hearten the people? Ministers and men, and women and children, we must do our uttermost as patriots. We must seek to have a spirit of willingness, free from murmuring and discontent, avoiding unnecessary criticism of those charged with great responsibilities, a spirit of loyalty in the highest sense. We must do our full part in helping to care for those who fight our battles, for the sick and the wounded. The work of the Red Cross makes its own appeals to the followers of the Crucified—of Him who was the Healer and the Comforter in all the ways of life. The clergyman is often the natural leader in all the activities which are to help the cause.

There will surely be impoverishment. However, if we suffer these activities to stay those which belong to us as citizens of the kingdom of God, if the people are deprived of the help and strength, of the cheer and solace which are to be found in the House of God, in the open Gospel, in access to the throne of grace, there will be loss. It is the mission of the Church and its duty to labor more earnestly than ever before to bring to her children the strength and the refreshment in this their hour of need, which comes from touch with the divine.

The Church is not the place for the activities of war. The Lord's Day will be more helpful if it be kept for the Lord. Never will there be greater need than in these days to come of God's message from the pulpit, of the solace for wearied souls that comes with the atmosphere of prayer and praise, when the windows are opened towards heaven, of the grace and strength that comes from the Sacrament of Christ's love—never will there be greater need of the pastorate in the homes of the people.

I remember two beleaguered cities, where the people still gathered for worship—though the sound of the cannon was heard—and where men like Gibson and Peterkin and Minnigerode exercised their fullest ministry to the help and the heartening of the congregations. The Church must be faithful to her divine mission, and must speak from God to the people—and all the more because, in days like these, we need to hear His voice. My counsel, therefore, to the clergy and to the people, is to keep close to God, to keep open the doors of the Church, and to conserve for the land the abiding things of God.

There is a great deal in the transient literature of the day which deal with the changes which are to come through the convulsion of war. Men say that we will be living in a new world; and some are questioning as to whether we shall need the same faith; the same Church and the same Gospel. But if it is to be a new world worth living in, it must be a world wherein dwelleth righteousness—not the righteousness of Utopian dreamers, but the righteousness of God.

Through all the changes—and what men call the chances—of time there must be the things which cannot be shaken, the things which abide. The world will have not less, but larger, need in the days to come of the touch with God; of the knowledge that He is the Father; and that He can make all things work together for good to them that love Him.

In the days to come, men and women, in the crowded and saddened ways of life will need to see all the more clearly the vision of Christ; the Saviour; the Friend; the Healer. Men and women, feeling their weakness and helplessness to meet alone the added strain and stress of life, will need as never before the grace and power of the promised Comforter. They who mourn their dead will not be consoled with the guesses of a passing philosophy, but will demand to hear—as never before—the voice of Christ, "I am the resurrection and the life."

 These are the things which remain; which belong to the eternal verities. War, and disaster and sorrow only make them the more necessary to the souls of men. These are the living truths which can never be outgrown; and which alone can stay the heart of the world when the roar of battle has died down, and the peace of God's kingdom has begun to dawn.

There comes back to me the words of God to His prophet—spoken in troublous times:

"Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem," or as the old Hebrew words which linger in my memory have it—"Speak ye to the heart of Jerusalem"—
Al-lev Jerusalem.

O, my brethren of the clergy, ye heralds of the Christ, speak ye to the heart of Jerusalem.

A NEW DAY FOR CHURCH WORK IN THE COLLEGES.

The Rev. Paul Roberts.

At the invitation and also at the expense of the Collegiate Department of the General Board of Religious Education twenty-eight Church workers in college towns gathered at Howe School, Indiana, at the generous invitation of Dr. McKenzie, to discuss the problem of the college student, as that problem so vitally concerns the Church. It was the second conference of the sort that had been held, the other one meeting last year in Chicago. For a good many years the Church has not been awake to the great opportunity and responsibility that the college offered to it. Too large a number of college students have been utterly indifferent to the Church, and the Church has allowed that situation to remain practically untouched. But at last the realization is coming of the tremendous loss that the Church is suffering because of this neglect, and these two conferences mark the first step in the meeting of the issue squarely.

For three days the conference worked under the able chairmanship of the Rev. J. M. Page, of the University of Illinois, and guided by the hand of the Rev. Paul Micou, the Collegiate Secretary of the G. B. R. E. Bishop Reese and Dr. W. E. Gardner were also present. Each one gave the conference a splendid address and also joined helpfully in the deliberations.

To bring to the General Church and to the pastor in a college community who, perhaps, does not recognize his responsibility, a realization of the work the Church must perform for the student, the following statement of the function of the Church in the college community was passed as the expression of the mind of the conference.

In a college community the function of the Church, as the Body of Christ, and the perfect expression of the Christian life, is—

1. To nourish the spiritual life in its members within the college community.

2. To win new members to the Church.

3. To train students to become leaders in the Church's work at home and abroad.

4. To set forth the ideal of Christian unity.

To this end Church workers among students should—

1. Comprehend the religious conditions of student thought and life.

2. Comprehend the Church's task of interpreting Christianity and the Church to students.

3. Know the methods and materials provided by the Church for the accomplishment of the task.

4. Apply materials and methods to local student work.

How may the Church best perform this function? That was the question these men came from all over the country to discuss, and perhaps the most hopeful feature lay in the splendid, forward-looking, earnest type of men that represent the Church to the students of the country. The most important action that was taken to meet this responsibility was the formation of "The National Student Council of the Episcopal Church." This Council is to consist of two Bishops, three representatives of each province, who are communicants in good standing in this Church, one a clergyman in a college community, one a faculty member and one a student; and two representatives each of the General Board of Religious Education, the Board of Missions and the Joint Commission on Social Service. The Secretary of the Collegiate Department of the General Board of Religious Education is to be the President of the Council. Any collegiate organization of Episcopal students may become a unit of the Council by agreeing to fulfil the minimum program set forth by the Council. It shall cease to be a unit when it fails to fulfil the minimum program for two successive years.

This minimum program shall be regular activities in (1) worship, (2) religious education, (3) Church extension, (4) service, and (5) meetings to promote the aforementioned objects. The Council shall arrange conferences, provincial and national, of Church college workers.

It was strongly felt that this action marked a new epoch in the work of the Church among college students. Now the Church recognizes her responsibility and it will be met in a really big way. The thing for which student workers have been feeling for for a long time has at last been accomplished, a united organization, bringing to bear upon this great problem the unified forces of the entire national Church. It was also felt that this organization would be a real factor in facing the serious situation that confronts the Church at the present time, the dwindling of her ministry. A good deal of real hope for the recruiting of the ministry was felt to lie in this Council.

An outline of a manual of Church Work Among College Students was submitted for consideration. Each man present was given a copy to take home for study and to send suggestions to the Collegiate Secretary.

A Publicity Committee was left to collect an exhibit of Church advertising among students to be used by the National Council for the help of local workers.

The Rev. Morton C. Stone, from the University of Wisconsin, read a splendid paper on "The Religious Education of the College Student." He recounted the difficulties in the way of that education, and made several helpful suggestions as to overcoming them, the most valuable of which was, perhaps, the intensive study courses beginning Friday evening and lasting over Sunday, often taking the form of retreats. These had been tried in various ways with splendid results. The curriculum of the course might be on (a) Vital Religion Subjects, (b) Biblical Subjects, (c) Vocational Subjects. It was voted to give the paper read by Mr. Stone as wide publicity throughout the Church as possible.

Mr. W. H. Tinker, of the Student Department of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A., spoke of the work that body is doing among the students of the country in Mission Study classes, recruiting men and women for the ministry and the mission field, and in raising money for missionary purposes. The conference voted to co-operate in every way possible with the Y. M. C. A. in Mission Study classes and recruiting where such co-operation was not in conflict with the principles of the Church, and that the matter of co-operation in raising missionary funds be left until a more definite statement of methods had been made, but recording its conviction that no funds for missions should be raised among students of the Church except through the agencies of the Board of Missions.

Other helpful addresses were made and valuable suggestions offered. It was felt very deeply that the conference was of inestimable importance, and marked a long needed forward step toward the proper training and education of leadership for the new age that we are facing.

Commencement at the Theological Seminary in Virginia.

The ninety-fifth annual commencement of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia took place on Thursday, the 6th of June, preceded by the regular missionary service and sermon on Wednesday night, June the 5th. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. W. Reid, of Christ Church, Tarrytown, N. Y., an alumnus of the institution.

The commencement exercises began at 10 o'clock on Thursday morning in the chapel. Bishop Gibson and Bishop-Coadjutor Brown, together with the professors, occupied their accustomed seats before the chancel, while the students of the Senior Class were seated in the choir, all bishops, professors and students vested in their academic gowns. The exercises opened with the 260th hymn, "God of the prophets, bless the prophets' sons," after which Bishop Gibson read appropriate prayers. He then announced the class promotions of those students who had passed all the required examinations in the respective classes. Messrs. Frank Cox and Noble Chiley Powell were advanced from the Junior to the Middle Class, and Paul Delafeld Bowden, B. S., Robert Alexander Brown, John Fleming, Wren Feild, Elmer Churnside Pedrick, Paul Lambkin Powles, B. A., Benjamin Richardson Roller and Francis Bland Tucker, B. A., from the Middle Class to the Senior Class.

The Bishop then announced that the following Bishops and clergymen have received the degree of Doctor of Divinity from the Board of Trustees at its last meeting:

The Rt. Rev. William Proctor Remington, an alumnus of this Seminary, Suffragan Bishop of the Missionary District of South Dakota; the Rt. Rev. Clinton Quin, an alumnus of this Seminary, Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of Texas; the Rev. J. Cleveland Hall, rector of Epiphany Church, Danville, Va.; the Rev. William Jackson Morton, an alumnus of this Seminary, rector of Christ Church, Alexandria, Va.; the Rev. Cleavius Orlando Pruden, an alumnus, Principal of Chatham Episcopal Institute; the Rev. John F. Ribble, an alumnus, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, Va., and examining chaplain; the Rev. Frederick G. Ribble, an alumnus, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Petersburg, Va., and Vice-Principal and Professor of Greek of the Bishop Payne Divinity School; the Rev. Samuel Tyler, rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, N. Y.; the Rev. Peregrine Wroth, an alumnus, Archdeacon of Baltimore and rector of the Church of the Messiah.

The address to the Senior Class, full of earnestness and spiritual power, was given by the Rev. Thomas Semmes, of Meade Memorial Church, South Richmond, Va. Bishop Gibson also made a short address to the class, emphasizing the wonderful epoch of the world in which its members were entering upon their ministry. The session of 1917-1918 closed with the benediction by the Bishop.

Centennial Celebration of the Protestant Episcopal Education Society in Virginia.

This interesting memorial celebration followed immediately after the closing exercises of the Seminary and marked the important event of the founding of the Protestant Episcopal Education Society in Virginia in the year 1818, which has done so much in its wonderful career for the support of the Seminary, and the sustentation of students during their period of study at that institution. "The Education Society" was first organized as a voluntary association, general in character, and governed by a Board of Managers, in which the members of the Church in the two neighboring Dioceses of Maryland and Virginia were equally represented. It was established, as we have seen in the year 1818, in Christ Church Parish, Georgetown, D. C., and its original name was the Education Society of the District of Columbia, afterwards the Education Society of Maryland and Virginia, and then, when its official existence was transferred, under a change of circumstances, to the Diocese of Virginia, it obtained a charter from the Legislature of Virginia under its present title.

Bishop Gibson, as President of this society, presided at the centennial commemoration. The proceedings were opened with the singing of the hymn, "O, God, our help in ages past," when Bishop Gibson used some appropriate prayers adapted by him to the present occasion. The first address, an historical one of great interest, was delivered by J. Holdsworth Gordon, Esq., a leading lawyer of the city of Washington, and a member of Christ Church, Christ Church Parish, Georgetown, D. C. He spoke of its foundation and early years, and in eloquent and well-chosen words referred to the most prominent of its first leaders and supporters, the Rev. Renel Keith, the Rev. Dr. Wilmer and Francis Scott Key, the celebrated author of the "Star Spangled Banner," as well as of the well-known hymn, "Lord with glowing heart I'd praise thee." He also told of the consecrated Christian character of this pastor and prominent churchman, and of his great influence in leading the noted Virginia statesman, John Randolph, of Roanoke, to an humble and full acceptance of Christ as Lord and Saviour.

The second speaker was the Rt. Rev. James R. Winchester, D. D., Bishop of Arkansas. His main subject was the power and wide influence of this society in the development of our Church throughout this country and its extension into the foreign missionary fields. Among others he mentioned Bishop Leonidas Polk, the first alumnus of the Seminary who was raised to the episcopate, as Missionary Bishop of the Southwest, and his work in planting our Church in what is now his Diocese of Arkansas; Bishop Lay, who continued the missionary work of Bishop Polk; Bishop Joseph P. B. Wilmer in Louisiana, Bishop Richard Hooker Wilmer in Alabama, Bishop J. Freeman Young in Florida, Bishops Kip and Wingfield in California, Bishop Perry in the Middle West, and Bishops Boone in China and Williams in Japan. He laid special stress upon the meaning of "pious" in the phrase found in the full title of the society, and spoke of its true characteristic sense in describing the spirit of a minister. He gave a splendid suggestion for the adornment of the space in front of the Seminary in the ideal picture that rose in his imagination of a statue of Bishop Meade as the Christian Bishop and leader, and also one of Francis Scott Key as the Christian patriot, quoted as founders of the Seminary. We hope this will be realized in the future. Bishop Winchester's address was a fitting close to this great commemoration, full of spiritual force, deep conviction and the benediction of high Christian character. It was followed by the singing of Francis Scott Key's hymn and the pronouncing of the benediction by Bishop Gibson.

The Alumni Meeting.

This was held shortly after the close of the centennial celebration of the Education Society, with the President, the Rev. W. M. Dame, D. D., in the chair. After the singing of a hymn and prayer by the Rev. Charles E. Bock, of Rock Creek Parish, Washington, D. C., the minutes of the meeting of 1916 were read by the Secretary. On motion of the essayist, the Rev. James W. Morris, D. D., of Richmond, it was agreed that the essay be postponed from this meeting to that of next year. Committees were appointed to draft resolutions of esteem in memory of Bishops Peterkin and Randolph and the Revs. J. Thompson Cole and Dr. Frank Page for the next annual meeting. A beautiful silk Service Flag dedicated to the alumni now defending liberty and true righteousness in the great war either in the army and navy, or as chaplains and Y. M. C. A. workers, was presented by the Rev. John L. Jackson in the name of the class of 1908. The Rev. B. D. Chambers then unfolded the flag and read the Honor Roll, the alumni standing. It was accepted by the President, Dr. Dame, who then read an appropriate prayer, and asked that hymn 196, "Our Father's God to thee," be sung. The flag is hung at the front of the choir on the south side of the chapel. There are over fifty of the alumni in the army, navy and Y. M. C. A. war service, beside undergraduates. The alumni then adjourned after some routine business and met for dinner at 2 o'clock in the refectory. The after-dinner speeches, with Dr. McKim as toastmaster, all had reference to the work of the Church and Seminary in the present war for liberty and a righteous peace after the merited defeat of Germany. Dr. McKim, Dean Green, the Rev. W. Page Dame, D. D., Lieutenant Riley, of the Canadian Army until he was wounded so severely at the front that he could no longer continue in service, and Chaplain Niver, of the Marine Barracks at Quantico, gave stirring addresses which inspired all present. Bishop Tucker dismissed the Alumni Association with the benediction, closing one of the greatest days in the history of the Seminary. There was a large attendance of alumni and friends.

Ordination Day.

The ordination services were held as usual on Friday after the closing day of the Seminary, at 11 o'clock in the chapel. The Bishops, professors and candidates with their presenters and other clergy vested in Prayer Hall, and marched in procession to the chapel during the singing of the hymn, "Stand up, stand up for Jesus." When all were seated in their appointed places, Bishop Gibson read a few collects before the sermon. Morning Prayer having been said at half-past 7 o'clock by the Revs. J. G. Scott and H. G. Lane. The sermon was preached by the Rev. W. H. Laird, D. D., of Immanuel Church, Wilmington, Del. The deacons and priests were next presented to their respective Bishops as follows: To Bishop Darst, of East Carolina, Theodore Partrick, by Dr. Wallis, and Boston McGee Lackey, by the Rev. George F. Hill; to Bishop Gravatt, of West Virginia, Benjamin D. Roller, by his father, the Rev. Robert D. Roller, D. D.; to Bishop-Coadjutor Brown, of Virginia, Tewfik David Harari, by Dr. Crawford; Robert William Lewis, by the Rev. J. J. D. Hall, and Edward Harold Vogt, by Dr. Wallis. Candidates for the priesthood:—to Bishop Darst, the Rev. George Boate, by Dr. Wallis; to Bishop Gibson, the Rev. Frederick D. Goodwin, M. A., by his father, the Rev. Edward L. Goodwin, D. D., and the Rev. Messrs. William B. Everett, Jr., William Meade and Windfield Shiers, by Dr. Wallis. The gospel was read by the newly ordained deacon, the Rev. Benjamin D. Roller, and among the presbyters laying their hands on those ordained priests of the Diocese of Virginia were the Rev. William B. Everett, M. D., father of the Rev. W. B. Everett, Jr., and the Rev. J. H. Nelms, D. D., of Ascension Church, Washington, D. C.

The Bishops taking part in the service were the Rt. Rev. Robert A. Gibson, D. D., of Virginia; William L. Gravatt, D. D., of West Virginia; Beverley D. Tucker, D. D., of Southern Virginia; James R. Winchester, D. D., of Arkansas; Thomas C. Darst, D. D., of East Carolina; William Cabell Brown, D. D., Coadjutor of Virginia, and Arthur C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan of Southern Virginia.

The deacons of Virginia were assigned as follows: The Rev. Tewfik D. Harari to Northumberland County, the Rev. Edward H. Vogt to Luray and Rappahannock County, and the Rev. Robert W. Lewis to the work, under Archdeacon Neve, lately vacated by the Rev. W. Roy Mason to accept the rectorship of Christ Church, Charlottesville.

Of the other members of the Senior Class of this session, Clarence Edward Wolfe has been ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Maryland and is assigned to Thurmont, Md.; George Robinson Hiatt, M. A., will be ordained by the Bishop of Kansas in a short time; also Alexander Miller by the Bishop of Kentucky, and will be assigned to a church in Louisville, Ky.; A. F. Henry Serent will be ordained by the Bishop of New York and assigned to mission churches near Poughkeepsie, N. Y., and William Beeks Dern by the Bishop of Lexington and assigned to evangelistic work in that Diocese. The Rev. Sanford L. Rotter, M. A., already a deacon of the Diocese of North Carolina, will shortly be ordained to the priesthood and take charge of St. Paul's Church, Monroe, N. C. Gordon M. Reese, of the Diocese of Harrisburg, will continue in army work and not be ordained for awhile.

The War Commission of the Episcopal Church.

The Rev. Hedley H. Cooper, recently rector of Christ Church, Piermont, N. Y., and engaged in war work as a Y. M. C. A. hut secretary, was killed at the front about two weeks ago during the performance of his duty. It has been reported that he was killed while assisting in bearing a stretcher.

Mr. Cooper is the first of our clergy to fall in action, and he will therefore long be remembered as the one who has set an example of unselfish loyalty to the great cause to which we are committed.

Walter S. Danker, 104th Infantry, A. E. F. rector of St. John's Church, Worcester, Mass., has recently received the Croix de Guerre for bravery in action.

The War Commission is frequently getting letters both from voluntary chaplains and from chaplains overseas, to the effect that our men in home camps and at the front are eager to receive letters from their clergy. This applies to the laity as well as to the clergy; to fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters and friends. As one of our army chaplains overseas writes—"Tell your people to write long and often to the men in the army and navy. Letters are the chief pleasure we have, and that is not to say that life has not many pleasant features."

The War Commission Office is making out as thorough a list as possible of chaplains in the army, of voluntary chaplains and of Red Cross chaplains, also of the clergy who are enlisted as either officers or privates. It will be published before long. It will necessarily be incomplete, for the chaplains move from place to place very rapidly. Corrections will be received at this office with pleasure. In fact, the Commission counts on the clergy of the Church to keep it specifically informed of the movements of the chaplains. It would also be glad to hear of the work being done in a more informal way by local clergy at any of our camps.

Many letters are coming in to the office asking whether the names of our men in the service should be filed with the War Commission. Such names should be sent to the Army and Navy Council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, corner Twelfth and Walnut streets, Philadelphia, Pa. The Brotherhood has charge of this list.

The Geneva Summer Conference.

Miss Lindley is to teach a course in preparation for The Advent Call, the war play of the Woman's Auxiliary, at the summer conference to be held at Geneva, N. Y., from July 1 to 12 according to the final bulletin of the conference just issued. This course is primarily for diocesan trainers, but it will be open to any others who are interested. Another interesting course announced for the first time in this bulletin is the Junior clinic. His Star in the West, the Junior text book by Miss Dorothy Giles, is to be tried out in a class presided over by Dr. Arthur R. Gray. Ten or twelve children will be invited to attend this class, and the first thirty minutes of the session will be devoted to telling them the stories contained in the book. Canon Elmen-dorf announces a class in War Time Ministries of the Church, the purpose of which is to acquaint the student with diocesan, parochial and individual opportunities for war service. Social Justice in the Light of the War also promises to be of great interest. This course will be taught by the Rev. S. Glover Dunseath, of Jersey City, and is described as a "search for the definition and content of essential justice, studying schemes and organized plans for effecting and insuring the fullest and highest measure of justice for the units of society and society as a whole, before and in the light of the war." In the department of Religious Education the courses that will attract most attention are probably those by Miss Withers on the "New Junior Plan" and by Dr. Bradner on the first unit in Teacher Training, The Pupil.

A mystery play will again be presented out of doors under the trees on William Smith campus. The play chosen is The Great Trail, and already the parts are assigned, and the younger members of the conference are learning their parts and in some cases rehearsing in the various cities where they live. There is only one week for rehearsal in Geneva, but last year this was sufficient to insure a remarkably smooth and reverent production of Conquering and to Conquer.

Bishop Stearly is conference pastor and the preacher at the sunset services and on Sunday. The Rev. Wallace E. Rollins, of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, will conduct the conference Bible class. His subject this year is Spiritual Studies in the Earlier Epistles of St. Paul.

A large number have already registered. All correspondence in regard to the conference should be addressed to the Secretary, Miss M. J. Hobart, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

Presbyterians and Church Unity.

The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church at its recent session at Columbus, Ohio, received overtures sent up from thirty-four Presbyteries, urging:

(1) That the General Assembly overture the national bodies of our sister communions to hear and prayerfully consider a program for church union.

(2) That the General Assembly name a time and place, as early as possible, for an interdenominational council of Evangelical Churches.

(3) That our Assembly state frankly in this call that the purpose of the Council is to discuss, and if the way be clear, to adopt a definite plan of organic church union.

The Committee to whom the subject was referred submitted the following report, which was unanimously adopted:

"Your Committee, before recommending action, desires to congratulate the General Assembly, and through it the whole Church, that these overtures show that there is an earnest desire for church unity growing in power in the hearts of many, and a determined effort putting forth to accomplish the same.

"It is to be noted that our Church has long been forward in its expression and effort looking toward the reunion of the Evangelical Churches of America. We recommend the following action:

"First. That we, the Commissioners to the one hundred and thirtieth General Assembly now in session at Columbus, Ohio, do declare and place on record our profound conviction that the time has come for organic church union of the Evangelical Churches of America.

"Second. That this Assembly hereby overtures the national bodies of the Evangelical Communions of America to meet with our representatives for the purpose of formulating a plan of organic union.

"Third. That the Assembly's Committee on Co-operation and Union be authorized and directed to designate the place and time, not later than January 1, 1919, for the above-named convention; to prepare a suitable invitation, to fix the ratio of representation, and appoint the delegates of our body; to prepare a tentative plan of organic union for presentation, and to attend to all necessary arrangements.

"Fourth. That as a beginning the Moderator and Stated Clerk be directed to wire the four national Church bodies now in session, asking them whether they will appoint delegates to such a convention on organic union between the Evangelical bodies, explaining that we have voted in favor of it."

Applicants for Chaplaincies.

The Rev. Clyde F. Armitage, Secretary of the General Committee of Army and Navy Chaplains of the Federal Council of Churches, says:

"There is a question in many minister's minds as to the real need for chaplains. The need is vital for first-class men—there are openings for four hundred now—but there is no need for men of ordinary personality and average ability. There are close to three thousand applications on hand from these men, but they are not able to do the work of a chaplain, which is the most difficult form of the ministry.

"Three denominations always keep ahead of their quota—the Presbyterians, Congregationalists and Episcopalians. Applicants are approved, however, in order of their apparent ability rather than the date of receiving the application, and there is room for the best men of these denominations. The need for men of practically all the other denominations is urgent at this time."

The third session of the Training School for Army Chaplains has opened at Camp Taylor, Louisville, Ky. Already most of the graduates of the second session are on their way overseas to fill up vacancies in the regiments there.

The Northfield Conferences.

Mr. William R. Moody, President of the Northfield Schools and Conferences, has completed plans for the following conferences and summer schools, to be held at Northfield as usual this season.

1. June 13-21, etc.—Student Conference (Y. M. C. A.). Owing to war conditions the Eagles Mere Conference will be merged with this year. Dr. John R. Mott, recently returned from France, will preside. Other speakers are Dr. Robert E. Speer, Dr. Hugh Kerr, Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas Mott Osborne, Melvin Trotter, G. Sherwood Eddy, Bishop Guerry, of South Carolina, and Robert P. Wilder.

2. June 25-July 2.—The Young Women's Conference. This gathering of young women from colleges, preparatory schools and churches offers a strong program. The presence of J. Stuart Holden, D. D., of London, is greatly anticipated. Among the other speakers are Dr. Robert E. Speer, Miss Margaret Slattery, Dr. Gurubai Karmarkar, of India; Dr. John McDowell, Mrs. Kingman Robins, Mr. W. R. Moody and Mrs. Moody. Mrs. Herstrom and Miss Mead, of China, will bring messages from the mission field.

3. July 9-17.—The Summer School of Women's Foreign Missionary Societies. The Conference will be addressed by Dr. Speer, Mrs. Montgomery, Mrs. Peabody and others prominent in mission work at home and abroad.

4. July 17-25.—The Women's Summer School of Home Missions. Men and women expert in the problems of immigration, rescue work in great cities, frontier work and the rural field, will discuss these problems which so vitally concern to-day, as never before, the security of our Christian land and its institutions.

5. July 20-27.—Summer School of Sunday-school Workers. The delegates will be led in the study of methods, etc., by Dr. Sheldon, Dr. Harrison, of Mount Hermon; Professor Bailey, Professor Lewis, Miss Caulkins, and others prominent in this branch of church work.

6. August 2-11.—The General Conference of Christian Workers. To this Conference are invited all those who feel the need of closing up ranks and of availing themselves of the experiences, resources, courage and faith of fellow-Christians who are standing in the forefront of the battle line of the Church. The Conference will be addressed by Dr. Kirk, Dr. Stevenson, Dr. MacKenzie, Dr. MacColl, Dr. Vance, Principal O'Meara and others.

7. August 14-21.—The National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Information concerning the program can be secured by addressing Mr. G. H. Randall, Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia.

Methodists, North and South, profess to see in the high vote of one of their number, in a recent election for new Bishops, a straw indicating a popular sentiment in favor of national unity. The Rev. Dr. John M. Moore, one of the six new Bishops to be chosen, was a foremost Southern champion of unity, and it was he who secured the highest vote. The election took place at the General Conference just held at Atlanta. The others named were the Rev. Dr. W. F. McMurtry, the Rev. Dr. U. V. W. Darlington, the Rev. Dr. H. H. Du Bose, the Rev. Dr. W. N. Ainsworth and the Rev. Dr. James Cannon, Jr. The Bishops to be retired were Bishops Morrison, Waterhouse and Hess, the last named by far the best known outside of his own religious body. It has been planned to hold an adjourned session of the General Conference of Methodists of the North, and effect Methodist organic union, but the Unity Commissions failed to make the progress hoped for, and the historic event staged for Atlanta this year did not come off.

Names of Churchmen at Camp Wheeler Wanted: I am very desirous of obtaining a correct list of all soldier Churchmen in this camp. So if any rector, friend or relative will write me, giving full name, regiment, company or battery, I will greatly appreciate such service.

HORACE R. CHASE.
Camp Secretary, Brotherhood St. Andrew.
Camp Wheeler, Ga.,

The second Contingent of the American Commission for Relief in Persia, sent out by the Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, sailed from Seattle on June 8. These follow a party which sailed a few weeks ago, and whom they will join in Japan. The commission is to be headed by Dr. Henry Pratt Judson, President of the University of Chicago, and contains a number of prominent university and medical as well as business men.

These commissioners will aid and reinforce the Americans who are already stationed in that section of the world, distributing relief under the auspices of the American Committee for Armenian and Syrian Relief, of which Cleveland H. Dodge is Treasurer, No. 1 Madison Avenue, New York.

Two million two hundred and seventy-one thousand five hundred and seventy dollars has already been cabled to Persia. Thousands of refugees are collected in this district.

War and the Religious Outlook: President Henry Churchill King, of Oberlin University, heads a Committee on the War and the Religious Outlook, and has quit his Ohio work for the time and gone to New York to enter upon committee work. That work interests practically every Christian leader in America, and is to find out, if the committee is able to do so, what are the effects upon the churches of the war to date, and the war to come, and what the churches ought to get ready to do, once the war comes to an end. The matter is one constantly before the churches and before almost every meeting of Christian leaders, but so far as known, nobody has yet begun to answer any part of it. It is to find answers that President King and others seek to do.

Associated with this Congregationalist leader are three Methodist Bishops, President Faunce, of Brown University, and President Mullins, of the Louisville Seminary, both Baptist ministers, Dr. John R. Mott, of the Y. M. C. A., the only layman on the committee, the Rev. Dr. James I. Vance and the Rev. Dr. William Adams Brown, Presbyterian ministers, and the Rev. Dr. Wilford L. Robbins, the one Episcopal Church member, a former Dean of the Episcopal Seminary in New York, who retired two years ago because of ill health. It is stated that additions to the committee are to be made. It is purposed that members secure release from present work as far as they can, that they may enter upon this steering course study for churches after the war.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

New Zealand Soldiers at Christ Church.

The eleven o'clock service at Christ Church, Norfolk, Sunday, June 9, was a unique and inspiring occasion. Five hundred Church of England soldiers from a New Zealand transport in port over Sunday, attended in a body, at their own request. Pewholders gave way, of course, to the soldiers, who filled the entire nave. Most of the congregation took some of the men home to dinner after the service.

The New Zealanders brought with them their own British flag. Borne by their color sergeant, it was carried in the procession of choir and Clergy abreast of the stars and Stripes, always carried in the procession in Christ Church. During the service the flags of the two Anglo-Saxon Allies were set on the two sides of the chancel. After the benediction and before the recessional both were presented before the altar with the processional cross between them, while the national airs of the United States and Great Britain were sung, all standing at attention.

The order of worship included prayers and music appropriate to the cause of our country and our Allies. The Rev. Francis C. Steinmetz, rector of the church, responding to the inspiration of the occasion, preached a most eloquent war sermon, and bade the soldiers keep the Cross ever before them with their country's flag as they pressed forward in their great crusade for liberty, justice and right.

From their ship the men were brought to the church in special trolley cars and about fifty automobiles supplied by the Church, the Red Cross and the Rotary Club.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Summer Rest: There is no object of Church support more deserving of the attention and contributions of Church people at this time than this beautiful summer boarding house for working girls. Rates are five dollars a week, and no girl is allowed to stay more than two weeks. At these rates it is impossible to make the place entirely self-supporting, although the farm brings in a considerable income. About eight hundred dollars is necessary from voluntary contributions in order to make the place clear expenses. Even with war time demands such an object as this should not be neglected, because maintaining the health of working girls is one essential to winning the war. Contributions should be made to Mrs. S. M. Sarvey, Retreat for the Sick, Richmond, Va.

Herndon Seminary: The closing exercises of Herndon Seminary, Herndon, the Misses Castleman, associate principals, took place May 31 to June 5. The following program was carried out:

Recital, May 31, 3-5 P. M.—Music medal and prizes awarded to Misses N. R. Dickie, D. N. Carter and R. B. Stafford.

Class Day Exercises, June 4, 10 A. M.—Patriotic songs and recitations. Prizes to the grades in Thrift Stamps and patriotic books.

Address—Patriotism, the Rev. Lewis Harper, of Herndon, Va.

Graduating Exercises, June 5, 1918—Delivery of diplomas and address to the graduates, the Rev. R. A. Castleman, of Falls Church, Va. Diplomas awarded to Misses Thelma Leone Thompson (honor graduate), Ellen G. Collier, Nettie R. Dickie and Paula M. Jenkyns, all of Fairfax County. Scholarship medal, won by Miss Thelma Thompson, who also led in the composition contest, "Liberty or Death."

Of the confirmation class, at the Old Falls Church, June 2, the following candidates from Herndon Seminary were presented by the rector, the Rev. R. A. Castleman: Misses Dorothy Neil Carter, of Philadelphia; Hortense O'Brien Lloyd, of Baltimore, and Thelma Leone Thompson, of Herndon.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. K. G. Finlay, rector of Trinity Church, Columbia, has been granted a year's leave of absence by his vestry, and will go to France at once for war work.

The Rev. William Way, rector of Grace Church, Charleston, has been appointed religious chairman for South Carolina to promote the sale of thrift and war savings stamps. Mr. Way is giving a part of each day to this work. Mr. Way delivered the address at the annual field day service at the Charleston Navy Yard, May 30. Several thousand persons were present.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Darien: The day of humiliation, prayer and fasting called for by the President of the United States was duly observed at St. Andrew's Church, Darien, the Rev. H. W. Robinson, rector. A large congregation assembled and took part in the service, which was most impressive.

St. Andrew's has an Honor Roll in the vestibule of the church with the names of eighteen members who are serving their country in army, navy or aviation. This is a remarkable showing for this small parish. Practically all the congregation belongs to the American Red Cross, and is delighted that the quota asked from the McIntosh County Chapter, $900, was so largely oversubscribed that more than $1,300 has been received up to date. Some of the late subscriptions are from the colored people, who have taken a keen interest in the campaign.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

An Unusual Prayer Service.

On Memorial Day material things were laid aside for awhile and a great prayer service was held at noon at Five Points in response to the proclamation of the President.

Bishop Mikell suggested to the Mayor that it would be very appropriate to have such a service, and the Mayor adopted the suggestion and immediately went ahead with arrangements for it. All business was set aside practically all day.

A platform was set up at Five Points, on which were seated representatives of various religious bodies; a number of men in khaki, and men from the Y. M. C. A. There were also present a Jewish rabbi and a Roman priest.

The Governor of the State was there, and the meeting was conducted by the Mayor of Atlanta. Three cheers were given for President Wilson and for each of the great generals "over there." There was a tremendous crowd. Street cars and automobiles were stopped or took another route. There was a moment of silent prayer, familiar hymns were sung, and finally the Star Spangled Banner. The prayer was offered by Bishop Mikell, who also made an address.

St. James', Marietta: The Easter offering at St. James', the Rev. R. R. Claiborne, rector, was doubled what it amounted to last year, and all of it went for missions. There had been a floating indebtedness of over $400 a month before, which was cleared out of the way before Easter. And now every obligation to the general work of the church has been paid up. The Bishop recently visited the parish and confirmed ten candidates.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

Anniversary of St. Anne's, Middletown.

The two hundred and thirteenth anniversary of St. Anne's Church, Middletown, will be celebrated with appropriate ceremony in the ancient church on Sunday, June 16, with morning and afternoon services. The Bishop of the Diocese will preach the sermon at the morning service and the rector, the Rev. Percy L. Donaghy, will conduct the services. In the afternoon Evening Prayer will be said, and the Hon. Edward C. Stokes, ex-Governor of New Jersey, will make an address. All friends interested in this venerable and historic building are requested to make an offering at this service for the upkeep of the building and grounds and towards the fund needed to continue the erection of the wall around the cemetery. Those unable to attend may send contributions to Mr. N. M. Willis or Mr. J. C. Bragdon, Middletown.

NEW JERSEY.

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary.

This event occurred at Asbury Park May 14 and 15, and included one joint session with the annual convention of the Diocese, occurring at the same time and place.

There were one hundred and fifty-five delegates present, representing sixty-two parishes.

Mrs. Arthur S. Phelps, of Plainfield, presided at the sessions and was re-elected President of the branch. Other officers chosen at the annual election were: Vice-President of the Upper Division, Mrs. W. Dutton Dale, and of the Lower Division, Mrs. Charles Stevenson; Treasurer, Miss H. B. Driggs; Treasurer of the United Offering, Mrs. R. Bowden Shepherd; Corresponding Secretary, Miss Zella Kelly; Recording Secretary, Miss Florence M. Roberts. Miss Schwartz, of Lakewood, still has charge of the Junior work, and Mrs. Paul Matthews is chairman of the Devotional Committee. Other Committees on Foreign, Domestic, Indian, Negro and Diocesan Missions are well officered.

Resolutions of regret were adopted for the retirement, after long service, of Mrs. John N. Carpenter, Miss Isabel Tweedy, Miss Runk, Mrs. Hoe and Miss Melville. Offerings reported by the several committees were as follows: Domestic, $5,521.83; Foreign, $2,946.23; Diocesan, $1,986.09; Indian, $2,348.31; Negro, $1,123.64; united offering, $4,315.68; ten-cent assessment, $208.32; expense fund for annual meeting, $62; missionary fund, $214.86. The Junior offering is not yet reported.

Pledges made for the ensuing year were many and of wide scope.

Convocation Meetings.

Meetings have been held recently of the Convocations of Burlington and New Brunswick, that of the former in Trinity Church, Vineland, and of the latter at All Saints' Church, Navesink.

The preacher at Vineland was the Rev. A. Q. Bailey, of Wildwood. The leader of discussion on the topic considered at both places was, at Vineland, the Rev. Harold Morse, and at Navesink, the Rev. L. E. Hubard.

The discussion on both occasions was the revision of canons by the convention to make the Board of Missions a Diocesan rather than Convocational institution; and both Convocations recommended the change.

The Archdeacon's reports showed much progress in most of the missions of the Diocese.

Annual elections resulted in the re-election of all the existing officers.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop.

Clergy in War Service.

The following clergymen of the Diocese are going for a certain number of weeks to army camps to assist the chaplains. These clergymen have the sanction of the Ecclesiastical Authority of the Diocese and are Archdeacon E. J. Owen, of Sharon; the Rev. B. V. Reddish, of New Castle; the Rev. Dr. H. L. Taylor, of Erie, and the Rev. Dr. William R. Agate, of Emporium.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. Wm. F. Adams, D. D., Bishop.

Easton Annual Convention.

The fiftieth annual convention of the Diocese assembled in Christ Church, Easton, June 4 and 5. The convocation sermon was preached by the Rev. Sidney Albion Potter, who took for his text Exodus 14:15, urging all to greater activity for the Master.

The elections resulted in the return of all the officers to their old positions.

The Standing Committee was re-elected, the Rev. Mr. Davies taking the place of the Rev. David Howard, deceased. Delegates to the Provincial Synod, which meets in Baltimore in November, were the Rev. Messrs. George C. Sutton, D. D., S. A. Potter, J. D. Cummins and Louis L. Williams; Messrs. William M. Cooper, F. Lee Bonnevillie, E. Thomas Massey and W. Hooper Gibson. Alternates, the Rev. Messrs. W. F. Bayle, S. S. Hepburn, D. D., J. H. Chesley and Albert L. Jones; Messrs. Edwin Dashiell, John McDaniel, Colonel Henry G. Waters and General Joseph B. Seth.

An invitation from Elkton to hold the next convention there was accepted. The meeting Wednesday evening was given up to the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the Diocese, and the thirtieth year of Bishop Adams' care of the Diocese.

An exceedingly interesting paper was read by Judge James A. Pearce, Chancellor of the Diocese, giving a sketch of the Diocese during the last fifty years, and a paper written by the Rev. Robert Wilson, D. D., was read by the rector of St. Peter's Parish, the Rev. Henry Davies. Dr. Wilson was during many years rector of Christ Church, St. Peter's Parish, and is the only surviving clergyman who was in the Diocese when organized. The Rev. G. W. Lay, rector of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, N. C., son of Bishop Lay, our first Bishop, made an address, referring to the Diocese during his father's episcopate.

At the close of this interesting meeting Bishop Adams was presented with a purse of gold from the laymen of the Diocese.

Notes.

The Rev. J. A. Brown, formerly rector of Spring Hill Parish, has retired and is living in Princess Anne, Md.

The Rev. C. H. Jordan, Williamsston, East Carolina, has been called to Spring Hill Parish, Quantico.

A summer school for instruction in Sunday school work will be held at Ocean City June 24-28.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary indulged in an innovation this month in that the last meeting for the season was held in the Church of the Advent, Brookline, one of our suburban missions, and took the form of an all-day conference. Besides local matters being settled, discussion was held concerning the New Junior Plan, the proposed Advent Call under the auspices of the Auxiliary, and with regard to the inauguration of a campaign to raise the $4,000 pledged for the building of a home for Dr. Mary James, in connection with the General Church Hospital, Wuchang, China. The Pittsburgh Branch has had a very successful year, in spite of the fact that nearly all its members have been very busily engaged in Liberty Loan and Red Cross Drives, as well as the regular work of the Red Cross Parish Units.

The sixth year of open air services, under the auspices of the Episcopal Churches of Pittsburgh, Sunday afternoons, on the corner of Smithfield Street and Second Avenue, Pittsburgh, began Sunday, June 2. The attendance proved the best of the six years. The Mayor of the city has recognized the movement of such importance as to issue an order closing the street for the hour. The Rev. William Porkess, the Chairman, presided. A new feature this year is the appointment of a director of singing. Well known hymns in very large type are fastened on the wall, and all who stop are urged to look and sing. The addresses were given by Archdeacon C. J. DeCoux and the Rev. W. N. Clapp, of St. Mary's Memorial Chapel, Pittsburgh. A large proportion of the clergy of the city and Diocese have enthusiastically entered into this movement.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

A notable service was held on June 5 at the old St. Gabriel's Church, Coles Creek. It was a country church service par excellence. It is about eighteen miles distant from Bloomsburg and a generation ago services were supplied there by the rector of St. Paul's, Bloomsburg. Within the past few years more regular services have been held. The minister in charge of Christ Church, Berwick, the Rev. M. H. Ake, who has been holding services with excellent effect, arranged for a visiting day on which church people in the neighboring parishes and missions were asked to be present. And they came from Bloomsburg, Berwick, Catawissa, Danville and Milton, by train and by automobile. The Bishop was present and the Archdeacon of Williamsport, the Rev. F. O. Musser, and the Rev. Messrs. Barlow, Fliedner and Bedell. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop, assisted by Messrs. Musser and Fliedner, Mr. Bedell preaching the sermon. Eight adults were confirmed. A luncheon was served on the lawn, at which time one other candidate was confirmed who was unable to be present at the earlier service. The time, place and service were redolent with the memory of the Rev. Mr. Rockwell, who was rector of this church for many years and for a part of the time was the local postmaster. This church is located in a grove of fine old trees, one of which is used as a bell tower.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Missionary work in behalf of the apportionment takes on new life in the Diocese through the naming of a vigorous committee to conduct an Every Member Canvass campaign. This campaign was authorized by the spring Convention, and it is to co-operate with an existing committee of the Convention, aimed to promote general missions. William Fellows Morgan is chairman of the campaign, Haley Fiske and William Walker Orr are vice-chairmen, Alvin W. Krech is treasurer, Samuel Thorne, Jr., secretary, and Frank H. Merrill the executive. The Bishop is at the head of the movement.

The Rev. Dr. Ernest M. Stires, of St. Thomas Church, has been granted a six months' leave and will leave for France under commission by the Y. M. C. A. This organization has just made an appeal for four thousand additional men, saying it needs two thousand this month, so short have been the numbers it has been found possible to send during April and May. The Association explains that with the steady increase in number of enlisted men being poured into France the number of men to serve them in huts and otherwise must constantly increase also.

IDAHO.

Rt. Rev. James B. Funsten, D. D., Bishop.

Annual Convocation.

The eleventh annual Convocation of the District of Idaho convened in St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, Thursday evening, May 23, the Rev. W. H. Bridge, of Moscow, preaching the Convocation sermon. All the clergy were present excepting four, two of which number are engaged in war service.

On Friday morning the celebration of the Holy Communion was held at 10 o'clock, the Bishop of the District being the celebrant, assisted by the Ven. Archdeacon Stoy, the Very Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, Dean of St. Michael's Cathedral, the Rev. Martin Damer. The Woman's Auxiliary of the District also took part in this service and presented their annual offering. The Bishop's address delivered at this time was both interesting and inspiring. "May we not hope," he said, "that after this awful suffering, when the last gun has been fired, and the bat-the flag has been furled, that then the nations of the world will become in reality the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ? Men will then, as a whole, build their social, religious and industrial systems on the precepts of the Holy One. The only government which is going to be safe for the world is practical Christianity. There is no sacrifice too great for us if we accomplish this."

Among the noteworthy features of the year's work the Bishop mentioned the building of a new church at Glenn's Ferry, the paying off of mortgages on St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, and Grace Church, Nampa, and the splendid class of forty-four presented by Dean Chamberlaine at St. Michael's Cathedral, the largest ever confirmed there.

Immediately after the service the Convocation convened in the Bishop Tuttle Church House, and elected the following officers: Secretary, the Rev. Thomas Ashworth; Treasurer, George H. Hackett. The Bishop appointed the following Council of Advice: The Very Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, the Ven. Howard Stoy, the Rev. Martin Damer, Messrs. R. M. Davidson and George H. Hackett.

The following clergy were elected delegates to the Synod of the Province of the Pacific, which will meet in Seattle: The Very Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, Boise; the Rev. S. W. Creasey, Fort Hall; the Rev. D. J. W. Somerville, Lewiston; the Rev. J. H. Dickinson, Pocatello. Alternates, the Rev. W. H. Bridge, the Ven. Howard Stoy, the Rev. Martin Damer, the Rev. Thomas Ashworth. Lay Delegates, Messrs. F. S. Randall, Lewiston; D. W. Church, Pocatello; R. M. Davidson, Boise; C. L. Longley, Twin Falls.

The sessions of the Convocation were full of interest, and several patriotic resolutions were offered and adopted bearing on the Church's work in supporting the Government in this crisis.

On Trinity Sunday, May 26, an ordination service was held in St. Michael's Cathedral in the presence of the clergy of the District and a large congregation. Andrew Luscombe Bramhall was ordained deacon, and the Rev. Thomas Ashworth and Rev. Homer Ellis Bush were advanced to the priesthood, the presentors being the Ven. Howard Stoy, the Rev. Martin Damer and the Rev. D. J. W. Somerville. The Bishop preached the sermon.

A very interesting commencement took place at St. Margaret's Hall from May 24 to 26, culminating in the delivery of diplomas to the two graduates on Sunday evening. The Rev. Mr. Somerville, of Lewiston, preached the baccalaureate sermon. The Bishop delivered the diplomas and made a short address. The school has a very good outlook for the coming year.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

The Rev. Edward J. d'Argent, who formerly was in charge of the work at Buffalo, Wyo., has returned to the District and is now taking the work of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Sundance.

Mr. Charles G. Baird, who has completed his middle year in the Philadelphia Divinity School, will spend his summer vacation in ministering to the work at Encampment and Saratoga. Mr. Baird will be ordained to the Diaconate at the coming Convocation.

Mr. Otey R. Berkeley, of Bexley Hall, will arrive about the middle of June to take up summer work at Medicine Bow and Encampment.

The Rev. A. Gordon Fowkes, who was transferred to Wyoming for the period of his Diaconate, to serve at St. John the Baptist Mission, Big Piney, has returned to the Diocese of Fond du Lac for his ordination to the Priesthood and for work in that Diocese.

Mr. John S. Gillespie has been assigned to summer work at St. Andrew's Church, Meeteetse. Mr. Gillespie is a Candidate for Holy Orders in this District, and will return in the fall for his senior year at the Philadelphia Divinity School.

The Rev. R. B. W. Hutt has resigned his duty as rector of St. Mark's Parish, Casper, Wyo., and has enlisted in the national service, being with the machine gun company, Sixty-second Infantry, Camp Fremont, Cal. Mr. Hutt has been in charge of the work at St. Mark's for four years.

OKLAHOMA.

Rt. Rev. F. K. Brooke, D. D., Bishop.

The Convocation.

The Annual Convocation met at El Reno, May 6, 7 and 8, the Woman's Auxiliary meeting at the same time as usual. The business was largely routine. But the conferences and evening meetings were made interesting and inspiring by addresses by Bishop Wise, of Kansas, on Religious Education; Bishop Thurston, of Eastern Oklahoma, on War Work and Our Duties Therein, and especially by very instructive addresses by the Rev. T. R. Ludlow, of our Hankow Mission. People who had heretofore known little of China and our duty towards it, went away with a very much larger vision and will always have it.

The Woman's Auxiliary elected much the same officers and took steps to take part in the Advent campaign. The Convention made practically no changes in officers or delegates.

Church Consecrated: On April 28 the Bishop consecrated Emmanuel Church, Shawnee, Rev. Charles Holding, rector, this being the second of the churches relieved from debt by the Bishop's Anniversary Fund.

Personal Notes

The Rev. William Henderson Watts, rector of St. Mary's Church, Haledon, New Jersey, has engaged for overseas service with the Y. M. C. A., and expects to sail some time during the latter part of June.

The Rev. William Farrand Livingston, for many years the faithful and efficient Secretary of the Diocese of Maine, while making steady recovery from his recent severe illness, has requested release from some of his duties. The Diocesan Convention recently held in Bangor has, therefore, elected the Rev. Arthur Thomas Stray, for several years Mr. Livingston's assistant in the Convention, to succeed him as Secretary. He should accordingly be addressed at The Rectory, Auburn, Maine.

The Rev. Joseph Edmund Thompson has resigned the rectorship of St.

John's Church, Covington, Ky., and accepted a call to the rectorship of St. Timothy's Church, Iola, and Ascension Church, Burlington, Kansas. He will be in residence at Iola about the middle of June.

The Rev. William H. Milton, D. D., rector of St. James Church, Wilmington, N. C., expects to work in the army camps in North and South Carolina and Georgia for the next six weeks, and requests that his mail be sent to Linville, N. C., where his family will be for some time.

The Rev. Charles C. Durkee, of Martinsburg, West Virginia, has accepted the rectorship of St. Thomas' Memorial Church, Oakmont, Pa., and will enter upon his new field of labor toward the end of the summer. He will also have charge of St. Thomas' Mission, Sandy Creek, Pa.

The Rev. Elmer M. M. Wright, formerly rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Nashville, Tenn., is now a chaplain in the National Army, with rank of first lieutenant. He entered the army in March and arrived in France the early part of April. His present address is Five Hundred and Fifth Service Battalion, Engineers., A. E. F., France, or he may be addressed care of Mrs. E. M. M. Wright, 1732 Heiman Street, Nashville, Tenn.

The Rev. R. B. Evatt, late of New Kensington, Pa., has taken charge for the summer of the missions at Ambridge, Georgetown, and Fairview.

The address of the Rev. Robert Carter, who has resigned the charge of St. Thomas' Church, Orange, Va., is the Lindhall Apartments, University, Va.

The address of the Rev. Alexander Galt is changed from Brandy Station, Va., to 629 Eighth Street, Bowling Green, Ky.

The Rev. George W. Lay, D. C. L., after a service of eleven years, has resigned the rectorship of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, N. C., and expects to take up parochial work after August 15.

Summer Addresses.

The Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., care of Mr. T. B. Wilson, Fredericksburg, Va.

The Rev. T. C. Hudson, from Paynesville, Minn., to Sacket Harbor, N. Y.

The Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., from Minneapolis, Minn., to Sorrento, Maine.

Ordinations.

In St. James Church, South Bend, Ind., on Sunday, June 2, Mr. Edwin E. Smith was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Michigan City. Mr. Smith will be in charge of St. John's Church, Bristol, Ind.

Mr. Stanley Parker Jones was ordained to the diaconate on Trinity Sunday by Bishop Burleson, of South Dakota. The sermon was preached by Dean Woodruff, who also presented the candidate. Mr. Jones will have charge of Lake Andes and Armour during the summer and complete his course at Seabury next year.

In Trinity Church, Toledo, Ohio, on Trinity Sunday there were two ordinations by Bishop Du Moulin. The Rev. (Continued on page 21)

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

Lynching: If the Church stands for anything it is for law and order, and in view of the fact that within the past week two counties in a Southern State have been placed under martial law on account of lynchings, it is well for Church people to read and lay to heart these words of our Attorney-General. He was commenting upon the case of Robert Prager, of Illinois:

From all the facts he could gather, Mr. Gregory was inclined to doubt that the murdered man was guilty of any crime or any offense. The facts in this case included the confession of one of the leaders of the mob that murdered Prager. "We must set our faces," said Mr. Gregory, addressing a national association of lawyers, "against lawlessness within our own borders. Whatever we may say about the causes of our entering this war, we know that one of the principal reasons was the lawlessness of the German nation—what they have done in Belgium and in northern France, and what we have reason to know they would do elsewhere. For us to tolerate lynching is to do the thing we condemn in the Germans. Lynch law is the most cowardly of crimes."

Clergymen with the army have two great duties to render. One is to give spiritual instruction and comfort to the men whom they are serving, and so keep the men in touch with the churches.

The other is to keep the churches in touch with the soldiers.

Men suddenly called upon to face such things as our soldiers are called upon to contemplate, and to do such things as they have to perform, are going to do a great deal of very serious, and sometimes very independent, thinking of their own.

As a clergyman discussing his work in a cantonment expressed it, "It is not so much what the churches are going to do with the returning soldiers as it is, what are the soldiers going to do with the churches?"

So the clergyman in the camps and on the fronts should be on the alert to interpret the soldiers to the churches, to tell us what those young men are going to expect of the churches upon their return.

And here at home we Churchmen and Church leaders might as well be preparing ourselves to make changes in our churches to meet the demands of these returning young men.

They will not come in contact with death and suffering and all the experiences of a campaign in France without forming some very definite conclusions on religious subjects.

The clergymen who share these experiences with the men are the ones to keep the churches at home informed as to where these conclusions lead, so that the returning soldier may find a church in which he will feel at home.

German Names: When men occupy high and important positions at Washington have such German sounding names as Rosenwald, Baruch, Goethals, Warburg, Schwab and Frankfurter, we can ill afford to look askance at a man because of his name.

One of the objects before the country today is to make "all Americans" out of all German-Americans.

Hermann Hagedorn, a poet, most of whose family are in Germany now, but who is an American, gives a recipe for accomplishing this purpose. He says:

"There is one infallible means to make German-Americans into straight Americans, and that is to treat them as such until they prove themselves otherwise."

Nothing breeds suspicion like suspicion. If you have a real doubt of a man's loyalty, unload that doubt with the Department of Justice, where they know how to classify and handle such things, and then dismiss it from your mind, and don't let it contaminate your thoughts or conduct further.

The Secretary of the State Council of National Defense is issuing a letter to the clergy which contains these cogent paragraphs:

The boundary line between patriotism and religion is now so shadowy that it is difficult to recognize any mark of cleavage. The war in which the United States is engaged is a holy war if there ever was one. It is inconceivable that Germany should win. It is inconceivable that this world should revert to the ethics of the stone age, when might made right and brute strength was the only recognized force.

With this thought in mind, I am asking the leading pastors of Virginia to preach, on the Sunday preceding July Fourth, a patriotic sermon—a sermon in which duty to God and duty to the State may be shown as running parallel. May I count upon you to do this? It will prove to be an incalculable benefit to the morale of Virginia if this is generally done.

No doubt this request is being made throughout the country, and surely the clergyman is dumb indeed whose heart will not respond to the inspiration of these great times.

Wastes!—Will You Help to Stop Them?

"More than 70,000 soldiers recently were recalled from the British front to take the places in munition works of men made drunk.

"Brewers in the United States use enough grain annually to make 5,000,000 loaves of bread daily.

"Reports by the Interstate Commerce Commission for 1914 show that more than 500,000 freight cars were used to haul almost 8,000,000 tons of liquor. Later reports show almost similar conditions. This when the world looks to the United States for the salvation of humanity.

"In 1917 the liquor traffic wasted more than 7,000,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs. In 1917 the liquor traffic wasted the work of 300,000 men. In 1917 the liquor traffic wasted millions in money, while millions of men sweated and became weary for all that life held dear.

"More than $2,000,000,000 are spent annually in the saloons of the United States and more than 2,000,000,000 additional are lost by inefficiency due to drink.

"In 1917 brewers of the United States wasted more than 3,000,000 tons of coal. And then came heatless Mondays.

"Almost 66,000 persons die in the United States yearly from the direct effects of liquor; several times as many die from diseases indirectly due to drink.

"In all the world last year more persons died because of drink than were slain in battle on the English and French lines. This is proved by data of insurance companies of Britain and the United States."

In view of the above figures will you, as individuals and ministers, not comply with the following request made by the forces that are trying to do away with the wastes throughout the country, a movement in which no less than 18,000,000 people are already enrolled?

Of those in the ministry it is asked that from the pulpit they instruct each member of the flock to send three telegraph messages to Washington—one to each of the United States senators and one to the representatives of the congressional district, demanding prohibition during the war. Every organization—religious, social, civic, philanthropic, industrious, commercial, fraternal, educational—every co-ordinated activity of life will be urged to send similar telegrams.

"Look Down On Thy Creation, Lord."

O, God of truth, whose living word
Upholds whate'er hath breath,
Look down on Thy creation, Lord,
Enslaved by sin and death.

Set up Thy standard, Lord, that we,
Who claim a heavenly birth,
May march with Thee to smite the lies
That vex Thy growing earth.

Ah! would we join that blest array,
And follow in the might
Of Him, the Faithful and the True,
In raiment clean and white!

We fight for truth, we fight for God,
Poor slaves of lies and sin!
He who would fight for Thee on earth
Must first be true within.

Then, God of truth, for whom we long,
Thou wilt hear our prayer,
Do Thine own battle in our hearts,
And slay the falsehood there.

Still smite! still burn! till naught is left
But God's own truth and love;
Thou, Lord, as morning dew come down,

Rest on us from above.

Yea, come! then tried as in the fire,
From every lie set free,
Thy perfect truth shall dwell in us,
And we shall live in Thee.

Luke 15:25

Third Sunday After Trinity: We have traced the return of the exiles, their setting up of the altar and rebuilding of Temple and city and wall, with their renewed consecration of themselves as a People to God and His law; and we come on this Sunday to the last of the reform measures recorded in the book of Nehemiah: (1) The cleansing of the temple from its defilement through the devotion of a room designed for sacred uses, to the personal use of one Tobiah; (2) the restoration of the tithes, failure to provide which had led apparently to the abandonment of the House of God; (3) the reclamation of the Sabbath from its complete secularisation due to the intrusion of business; (4) and finally the re-enforcement of the marriage laws which forbade inter-racial alliances. The selection shows how difficult it is to get a people to learn from experience. Here they were beginning all over again to commit the same sins essentially which had led to their captivities. Moreover, these were the sins of a people redeemed, restored and forgiven—it was as if the prodigal should again depart from home. There was also an utter failure to realize the call of the people to bear witness to the Gentile world of the truth of God as so wondrously revealed in their own history. Even in Nehemiah himself (a most interesting character study) we cannot fail to detect the beginnings of that religious self-consciousness which later became the spiritual ruin of the Pharisees (vs. 14, 22, 31). The New Testament lesson from Romans was selected to emphasize some of these points; especially that complacency which can boast of having the law, of occupying a position of privilege before God, and yet despise and criticise the rest of the world, at the same time so living as to bring the very name of our religion and our God into the contempt of the human race. The true Jew, said St. Paul, and it ought to be said the true Churchman, is he that is one internally and not externally, in the spirit and not in the letter. A decent heathen and still more a spiritually minded non-conformist is better in the sight of God than a dead Churchman.

For connection with the Altar services, it may be noted that this glorying in the possession of religious privileges, combining lip service with a censorious attitude towards others, led historically to the attitude of mind which made it possible for a people to censure the Master for consorting with publicans and sinners (Gospel) and merits St. Peter's, "God resisteth the proud but giveth grace to the humble" (Epistle).

For the evening lessons we have selected a passage which includes the topics of Sabbath observance, humility the law of promotion; the disobedience of the called; and the conditions of true discipleship: utter loyalty to the Truth, along with that humility which recognizes our need of divine assistance and which is the basis of prayer (Collect). The Old Testament Lessons illustrate this topic by a specimen prayer taken from the experience of the Jews in Captivity (16 to end probably best).

The week day lessons require no special comment, although attention may be called to the story (evening) of our Lord in conflict with Pharisaism and His pointing out the mistaken method of purifying the Church by excluding the bad.

Lessons for next Sunday, challenge to service, both nation and Church (A. M.); creation and regeneration (P. M.); or, Eve of John Baptist.

7. How must you regard self-sacrifice? Matt. 10:38; Jno. 15:20; 16:33, 45.

Note.—Jesus spends a busy period of teaching, with few recorded miracles after the wonderful one for Lazarus. He returns (Luke 19:11) to Jerusalem (Jno. 12:1) Thursday; and reaches Bethany Friday. In these last weeks He prepares His disciples as well as Himself for His death and its results: speaking parables of symbol and type of the Kingdom. Then more directly (Luke 18:31-34, teaching of His great Sacrifice, He gradually brings to a close the third Year of His public Ministry, the year of public manifestation. (Rhees 163-165) While St. Luke gives the fullest account of this teaching, St. John describes the results of His special teaching in Jerusalem to the authorities, in argument and warning (chapters 7-9).

Ten Thousand a Day.—Ten thousand khaki Testaments a day, week in and week out, is the record of production of the American Bible Society on its pledge to supply the Young Men's Christian Association gratuitously with service Testaments for American soldiers and sailors. One-half of the books have already been delivered, despite difficulty of obtaining paper, scarcity of labor and the delays in transportation. The Young Men's Christian Association has no funds for this purpose, and the American Bible Society looks to the Christian people of America for the money to meet the costs of manufacture. This is one of the ways in which the war is making the young men of this generation accessible to the Christian truth. The churches should eagerly respond to the call, for the society has undertaken to perform this emergency service, nothing doubting that the Christian public would desire to have it done and would pay the bill.—Christian Advocate (New York).

Before Action.

By all the glories of the day
And the cool evening's benison,
By the last sunset touch that lay
Upon the hills when day was done:
By beauty lavishly outpoured
And blessings carelessly received,
By all the days that I have lived
Make me a soldier, Lord.

By all of all man's hopes and fears,
And all the wonders poets sing,
The laughter of unclouded years,
And every sad and lovely thing;
By the romantic ages stored
With high endeavor that was his,
By all his mad catastrophes
Make me a man, O Lord.

I, that on my familiar hill
Saw with uncomprehending eyes
A hundred of thy sunsets spill
Their fresh and sanguine sacrifice,
Ere the sun swings his noonday sword
Must say good-bye to all of this—
By all delights that I shall miss,
Help me to die, O Lord!

Somme advance.

The Way Through the Desert.

N. B. T.

In the Eighty-fourth Psalm, which celebrates particularly the blessedness of living close to God, there occurs a singularly beautiful metaphor. The singer has reached that part of his song that pictures the child of God as a pilgrim, with the pilgrimage at its darkest hour. "Blessed is the man," he says, continuing his list of sweet beatitudes, "who going through the vale of misery use it for a well." This is more than surpassing poetry—it is an idea fraught with strange comfort for all of us wayfarers along the road of life. Each of us must pass through a vale of misery, some more than once or thrice as the long way unfolds, for that valley is as inevitably a part of human life as were the meadows of childhood and the high hills of youth. It is not a question of whether we shall pass through or not, for there can be no circumventing and no avoiding, but of how we shall pass through.

Sorrow, as has often been said, either sweetens or sours a life, either makes a man or breaks him. Certain it is that no soul emerges unchanged from the land of grief. For better or for worse the road dipped into the dark valley: it lies with the traveler himself how he will walk it, to what "use" he will put the strange region through which for a season his weary route lies.

Scattered about on the earth's surface are great tracts of fruitful land that were once desolate deserts, hot, dry and unspeakable. But little by little human ingenuity has redeemed them; by means of irrigation cool water has been diverted from the heights to the perishing acres, and now vegetation grows there and life abounds. The hand of man, guided by the hand of God, has "used them for a well." So may the Christian use his own spiritual desert lands—not the deserts of grief, only, but each of life's wastes of loneliness, discontent, despair. We may, if we so elect, struggle through them faint and thirsting, and maybe somehow reach the further side; but they have vast possibilities. We may, if we so elect, draw on the great reservoir of eternal providence and make of them as we go, places of sustenance and strength.

The psalmist appends a wonderful comment. "Who going through the vale of misery use it for a well," he sings, and adds with scarce a pause, "and the pools are filled with water." This strikes the heart as a lovingly significant affirmation. When the toiling engineers in the desert dig, and ditch, and lead along their ready pipes, the blessed water flows freely into the waste; so when we will to use our vale of misery as a well, at once by divine gravitation the life-giving fluid flows into our souls—the pools are filled with water. After that, rejoicing, we follow up the pilgrim song, we "go on from strength to strength"—from one deep crystal pool to another. And still after that, "unto the God of gods appeareth every one of us in Zion."

Concerning Children.

Anne Madison.

The mind of a child is like a grist-mill—whatever grain it may receive is quickly and effectively transmuted into another form. But it has peculiarities that the natural mill lacks: unless we are very careful what grain we feed to it, and how, strange material may finally emerge that is very disconcerting to the miller and most unprofitable to anybody. There is no end to the curious substitutes for the conventional cornmeal or flour that we thought we had a right to expect.

Particularly is this true when the grain is spiritual, so to speak. When the little mental machinery grinds a scientific fact wrong, or a social idea, or a literary allusion, school and experience soon repair the mischief. But it is otherwise when a religious impression gets caught in a cog: the mistake somehow sticks for an unconscionable time. Children are more given to mulling over the mysteries of the spirit than any adult dreams. The beauty and the exceeding mystery of sacred things early take strong hold of their imaginations. The stories of Scripture, the charmed words of sonorous old hymns, the strange significance of the Church's rites and rituals—all these the young soul invests with a wonder that is indescribable. With their awe and admiration is mixed, also, a profound curiosity that sometimes sweeps them far beyond their depths—as in the case of the little girl who, after hours spent in trying to compass the thought of eternity, was found shrieking at the top of her voice in the middle of the room. Many grown people can sympathize with her frenzy; yet many, alas, would have laughed and let her go on and tackle space!

Looking back at childhood we can all member at least one or two absurd blunders of our own that remained blunders for years. One little girl with an eager mind fretted herself much because she could not imagine Heaven;

she felt that by some means she must get a clear notion of the lay of that beautiful land. Finally, in desperation, she seized upon a certain picture in her "Bible Story Book," and took it to an older member of the family.

"Is this Heaven?"

The older member was sewing, and a seam had gone wrong. She answered yes briefly and without looking. The small inquirer withdrew to pore secretly—and withal somewhat sorrowfully—over the illustration, which showed the tabernacle tent of the journeying Jews. The bright wings of her dream sagged. If this be heaven, interesting, but commonplace, why strive for it all one's mortal life? A sympathetic little sister contributed an opinion: she had dreamed of heaven, she said, and it consisted of angels, hand in hand, dancing around a grave. But the other rejected this and fell back, dissatisfied, to the Israelitish tent. It was years before she discovered that heaven cannot be depicted in a line-drawing.

The church service frequently proves a rock of stumbling to the undeveloped mind. Sunday after Sunday the familiar words fall on childish ears, and when, once in a while, a phrase or a sentence falls wrong, the mistake is hard to eradicate. A small churchgoer found herself sadly harassed by an expression in the Fourth Commandment. Week after week the preacher described creation: "Heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in the Miz." She wrestled with the probable nature of the Miz. After long perplexity she drew a mental picture of it—a huge subterranean abyss inhabited by animals never known on sea or land. Vaguely it prejudiced her against the decalogue—the strange, strange mind of a child!

There was another preacher who blessed his congregation at the end of the service with what seemed remarkable disregard of the English tongue. "Keep your hearts and mines," he always said. One of his six-year-old parishioners harried her elders with persistent inquiry: "Why does he say 'and mines'? Why not 'and mine'?" It passed for too silly a question to answer, perhaps; at any rate, it stuck for years like an annoying burr—"Your hearts and mines." Why mines?"

Hymns are a fruitful source of confusion. Learned at home, with a word here and a word there of explanation, all goes well, but trilled haltingly in the wake of grown-up voices the grand old lines are subject to deplorable twistings. "Blest be the tide of binds" one small maiden sang cheerfully year after year. The tide of binds—what did it mean; what indeed could it mean? But she believed her ears; perhaps it had to do with the ocean . . . she sang on in trust.

A favorite hymn among children of an earlier generation was, "I Want to Be An Angel." That hymn has been set aside, now, as inaccurate and misleading; but to the enraptured ear of thirty years ago it was a psalm to which a certain passionate interest attached. For one singer, however, it held a serious flaw.

"I want to be an angel

And with the angels stand,

A crown upon my forehead,

A harp within my hand."

Now, the idea of the harp and the crown were clear-cut and wholly satisfying, but "the angels' stand"! What did angels possess that could be described as a "stand"—presumably a small piece of furniture of the table variety? The puzzler concluded, at last, that perhaps the stand was necessary for resting the harp against; but somehow the explanation marred the picture of the glad, capable little angel she had hoped to be.

Well, mistakes are after all stepping-stones, and sooner or later they right themselves and we are able to smile at our young obtuseness. But the fact remains that much of the liturgy, of the hymnal, of the Blessed Book itself would mean more to children if it were fed to them in easier and more digestible portions. There is so much strange grist for the little new mills to grind—the least we can do is to feed it into the waiting hoppers with watchful care!

Going to College.

When William Wallace, the elder brother of the late Lew Wallace, departed for college, thirty miles from his home, Lew was inconsolable. In a few days the desire for his brother's companionship got the mastery, and the small boy resolved to find the big brother. In his "Autobiography" General Lew Wallace tells of the undertaking:

It did not occur to me as the least needful to have my father's permission to make the change of residence. There was living in Covington an uncle not greatly my senior in years or wisdom. To my delight, I heard he was going to Crawfordville. The chance was too good to be lost.

I went out early in advance of him, and lay in ambush for the traveler. "What are you doing here?" he asked.

"Waiting for you."

"What for?"

"Have you any business there?"

"Yes, I want to go to college."

"To college!"

He fairly choked with laughter. His good nature finally overcame his scruples, and letting me mount behind him, he jogged on.

The pony was fat and slow, and of prodigious breadth of beam. My legs cramped, and I suffered in every bone and muscle, but I set my teeth and gave no sign.

About the middle of the afternoon we drew up in front of the basement entrance to the college, and unloading me, my relative pushed on to town.

A benevolent-looking old gentleman issued from the door, followed by a half-dozen young men. Small wonder that they viewed me askance. My straw hat, ragged and rain-stained, hung to the back of my head, and allowed my shabby hair the greatest liberty. My feet were bare and unwashed. My trousers hung dependent upon a single suspender of cloth "listing." My shirt, guiltless of a button, offered a display of neck and breast red as a Mohave Indian's.

The benevolent-looking gentleman inquired, "Where are you from, my son?"

"Covington," I answered.

"What's your name?"

"Lew Wallace."

"A son of Governor Wallace?"

"Yes."

"Any friends here?"

"Only William."

"What do you expect to do?"

"Go to college, if I like it."

The circle hemming me in broke into a laugh that put a stop to the inquisition. In the midst of the fun my brother appeared, himself a model of attire and deportment. To his credit, he it said, he did not disown me.

"Why, Lew, when did you come?" he asked, taking my hand.

"Just now."

"What for?"

"To be with you and go to college."

There were tears in the good fellow's eyes as he led me off to his boarding-house.—Christian Intelligencer.

Favorite Hymns.

VI. Holy Bible, Book Divine.

One of the hymns especially requested for this series was "Holy Bible, Book Divine," which follows below. This hymn is not included in the Church collection, but it is well loved by many an old Christian of the Episcopal Church as well as of others. It is full of evangelical sweetness and simplicity. The author is J. Burton, and the words appeared first in his "Youth's Mentor in Verse," in 1803, and later in a magazine of that period.

Holy Bible, book divine,
Precious treasure, thou art mine;
Mine to tell me whence I came,
Mine to tell me what I am.

Mine to chide me when I rove,
Mine to show a Saviour's love;
Mine art thou to guide my feet,
Mine to judge, condemn, acquit.

Mine to comfort in distress,
If the Holy Spirit bless,
Mine to show by living faith
Man can triumph over death.

Mine to tell of joys to come
And the rebel sinner's doom;
Holy Bible, book divine,
Precious treasure, thou art mine.

A Balloon Game.

Sometime you may find yourself, as hostess, confronted with the problem of amusing a family party ranging in age from small children to elderly persons. If you can get some toy balloons, you can rest assured that you have the means of giving everyone from youngest to oldest a jolly fifteen minutes.

Have the guests all sit in a circle and send one of the balloons round by having each person give it a little touch with his hand so that it will float to his nearest neighbor. As soon as it is making the circuit smoothly put in another balloon and presently still another. If the circle is large, you can perhaps keep four or five balloons traveling the amusing merry-go-round. Everyone will laugh, and grandfather will enjoy the game just as much as the six-year-old. If one of the children stays in the centre of the circle to retrieve balloons that "escape," the game will go on with scarcely a pause.—The Youth's Companion.

War Economy Corner.

Quick Breads.

Since our fighters in France must have bread in great quantities, it is imperative that we people at home use less than half the usual amount of wheat flour. That means strict care and economy in the matter of serving daily bread. It involves distinct sacrifice, also—but a sacrifice that we stand quite ready to make.

Fortunately, there are numerous and various good substitutes for wheat. Cornmeal, rolled oats, rice and buckwheat are the best known; barley flour, ground oats, corn flour, rice flour and potato flour also are in many markets. In some places less familiar products, such as peanut flour, sweet potato meal, soy bean flour, etc., can be obtained.

The above information is furnished by the United States Food Administration, which also reminds us of two important facts that are closely related—that the American people have always been partial to so-called quick breads—muffins, battercakes and like mixture—and that these quick breads require no wheat. The men in the trenches cannot conveniently be served that kind of bread; nor can the hard-working French women, with no time and no ovens, be expected to make it—they must make risen bread, which will keep. It is, to use the phrase of the day, up to us Americans. The Food Administration helps us out with the following easy and attractive receipts:

Barley Biscuits—Sift together two cupfuls of barley flour, half a teaspoonful of salt and four teaspoonfuls of baking powder, mix in two tablespoonfuls of fat, and add two-thirds of a cupful of milk, until a soft dough is formed. Roll the dough about three-fourths of an inch thick, cut it with a cookie cutter, and bake the biscuits in a hot oven.

Buckwheat Breakfast Cake—Use two cupfuls of buckwheat flour, a teaspoonful of soda, half a teaspoonful of salt, a fourth of a cupful of shortening and two cupfuls of sour milk. Mix and bake the ingredients in a flat pan so that the cake will be about an inch and a half deep when done. Cut in squares and serve hot.

Conservation Waffles or Griddle Cakes—Sift together two cupfuls of corn flour or of barley flour, three teaspoonfuls of baking powder and a teaspoonful of salt, and add slowly a cupful and a half of milk, the beaten yolks of two eggs, and two tablespoonfuls of fat. Beat the mixture thoroughly for a minute and fold in the stiffly beaten whites of the eggs. Cook it in hot, well-greased waffle irons or in griddle. Half corn flour and half peanut flour may be used instead of barley flour.

Oatmeal (Ground Oats) and Corn Flour Muffins—Use a cupful of milk, two eggs, a tablespoonful of melted fat, a cupful of oatmeal, a cupful of corn flour, four teaspoonfuls of baking powder and a teaspoonful of salt. Sift the dry ingredients together and add the liquid. Stir in the melted fat. Bake in well-greased muffin moulds for twenty-five minutes. Rolled oats can be prepared by grinding them through a food chopper.

The Vision.

Ida Mason Burke.

A ray of light far off and tremulous,
From out the blackness of my cold despair,

A gleam of hope—a stirring in the soul
Groping for God in unaccustomed prayer.

A clearer light—grown stronger suddenly,
Yet from its radiance I do not shrink.

Crowning that shaft of light my eyes behold
Thy cup of pain. Dear Lord, I kneel and drink.

Love came to me with a crown,
I took it and laid it down.
Love came to me and said,
"Wear it upon thy head."

"'Tis too heavy, I cannot wear it,
I have not strength enough to bear it."

Then my soul's belov'd spoke,
Saying, "Wear it for my sake,"
When, lo! the crown of love grew light,
And I wore it in all men's sight.

Hey for school days done and over,
Hey for bookless hours!
Birds on bough and bees in clover,
Miles and miles of flowers!
Fishing pole and bat and ball,
Cherries in the shade—
Hey for these, but first of all
Hey for hoe and spade!

Plenty still of play and pleasure,
But a lot of working;
Good green things in generous measure
Will not come for shirking.
Hey for apples falling fast,
Cool creek running slow!
But in war-time, first and last,
Hey for rake and hoe!

For the Southern Churchman. Eric's Strange Drug Store.

Hannah M. Frederick.

Eric had not been well for a long time. "I believe," said Uncle Doctor, at last, "that we'd better send this boy to old Mrs. Earth's drug store if we want to make his white cheeks red again."

So mother packed a trunk that night, and the next day they started on their journey. Eric was too listless to care where they were going; he did not even ask what "Mrs. Earth's drug store" might mean, though he wondered a little. It grew dark while they were on the train, and he fell asleep, murmuring, "I don't think much of going to an old store, I don't."

The next morning, right after breakfast, he walked out to look around. The country to which they had come was high and green, and the town was scattered around among the hills. After awhile he sat down on a bench to rest, huddling in the sun like a little chilly bird, and was almost dozing off when he noticed, about fifteen feet away, an odd arrangement like a small summer-house, with a circular railing inside. "What's that thing?" he said aloud to himself, and crept across the grass to see.

He found that the railing enclosed a round body of water like a shallow well. Moreover, the water bubbled. Eric had seen many wells and springs, but never before one just like this. He stood and gazed down at it.

"Have a drink?" asked a voice nearby, and he looked up to see a bright-faced boy in a cotton shirt and "butter-nut" trousers. By his side was a small table covered with glasses and dippers.

"I—don't know," Eric answered, slowly. "I'm not very thirsty. Do you stand here and give people drinks all day long?"

"Well, I don't exactly give them drinks," laughed the freckled lad. "You see, the water's free, but the folks here let me bring my glasses and dip it up for anyone that asks, and I get a little money that way."

Eric gravely produced a five-cent piece from his pocket. "I want a drink," he said.

The other handed him back four pennies. "That was too much," he remarked. "Here's your drink." He held out a crystal glass, brimming. "But want a minute. It's warm, you know, and you may find it tastes a bit queer."

"Why should it be warm?" Eric asked, at once. "The spring's in the shade and the air is chilly today."

"Why, you must be a stranger, sure enough," was the answer. "It comes out of the ground hot. Here, lean over and put your finger in. It runs like a fountain all the time. Sit down and I'll tell you."

Eric, very much surprised to find his finger tip wet with hot water, obeyed willingly, and listened eagerly while the other boy told him about the strange springs—how the heat 'way down in the earth warmed the waters, and different substances melted into it, so that scattered all around among the hills nearby were "wells" of various kinds, soda, sulphur and other sorts. "This one is a soda well," he finished.

"O, now I know what Uncle Doctor meant!" cried Eric. "It's a soda fountain, isn't it?"

The other boy, who turned out to be named Ben, had not ever thought of that, and he threw back his red head and laughed. "Not exactly," he said. "It was something on that order, though. All of these were natural wells," he added, "and so the whole town was called 'the springs.'"

Eric and Ben became fast friends, and the little newcomer was pleased when he found that the very water he was expected to drink for his health was the kind that bubbled out of Ben's particular spring. He drank industriously, and watched with deep interest his companion's box of pennies and nickels grow heavier each day. All the time, too, he asked questions of friends and strangers till he understood about the wonderful hot water wells.

When mother took him home, at last, Uncle Doctor lifted glad eyebrows. "Why, where on earth did you get those cheeks?" he asked.

Eric threw back his head and laughed the way Ben used to do. "I bought them in old Mrs. Earth's drug store," he said. "At her soda fountain. And what's more, Ben Brown is going to come down here to play with me!"

A Rainy Day Tea Party.

Helen T. R. Doar, aged 10. Summer-ville, S. C.

Mary and George have a big Scotch collie with loving brown eyes and a wagging tail. His name is Laddie. The two children live in Kentucky, where it is very warm and pleasant, in a pretty little cottage with roses around it. Mary is six and George is ten. Their grandfather lives not far from them, in a large white house surrounded by tall locust trees, and they often go to see him and take Laddie.

One day late in October their mother said, "Your grandfather wants you to come to his house tomorrow." But when morning came it was raining, and they could not go. George got a book and began to read, but Mary sat by the window and watched the rain. "O, dear," she sighed, "I just hate rain!"

"Hate rain?" said her aunt, coming in. "Why, child, you should not say that. If it did not rain what should we do for water? Think, too, of the birds and the flowers! Both our lives and theirs depend on rain."

George put down his book. "Why, I never thought of that," he said.

Then their aunt told them a piece of good news. Their mother had said they might have a tea party. She brought a little table and spread a white cloth on it; then she put on a little teapot full of hot chocolate and a small glass of blackberry jelly. The children were delighted. Mary ran into the kitchen and found there a plate of hot biscuits and some cheese-straws. After that they settled down and began to eat.

"I'm glad it's raining, now," Mary said.

"Where is Laddie?" their aunt asked, when the party was over.

"He's in the kitchen," said Mary. "Let's go in there and make him do some tricks."

They found Laddie licking up some blackberry jam. "Good old Laddie," said George. "He's having a tea party, too."

After awhile it stopped raining. "Didn't we have fun, though?" said George to Mary, as the two went out into the yard to play. "Let's go over to grandfather's and tell him all about it." And they did.

True Prayer.

I think you will find, if you take the trouble to ask, that a great many people feel that prayer is asking for something. There are those who believe that one prays only when one is asking for enough food, or warm clothing, or shelter from the storms, or health, or long life, and other blessings. If trouble or sorrow threaten, they pray that these things may not come; they pray for safety when they travel, and that their homes may not burn down while they are away, and that they may have a pleasant time.

Of course these things are prayer; but they are not all there should be to prayer. It does not seem quite fair to only talk to God, and never with Him. If we were never to talk with father and mother, excepting to ask them for this or that or the other, I am afraid they would begin to feel very sad and hurt; they will begin to say that all we cared for them was what they were able to give us; which would be a very dreadful state of affairs, indeed.

We know that ever so often we smile at mother, and tell her how happy we are because she has done this for us, or thought of that for our comfort, or because something else is just as it is. We are glad she loves us, and we love her dearly; we are lonely when she is away, and happy when she returns.

Now it is a good deal like that with prayer. We must talk with God, because we do really love Him. We must be glad of what He gives us, because we do love everything and everything He does for us. And, because we love Him, we praise Him and tell Him of our love. Of course God knows all the time just how much we love Him; but to hear us say so—must not that be sweet to Him, who loves us beyond all that we can imagine?

Do you suppose mother and father would be truly happy if we never ran to them and nestled up close and told them of our dear love? They would think us strange and distant and cold indeed, wouldn't they? And truly we would be; for that is the way human affection is shown—or at least, that is part of the way.

We must learn to pour out our hearts to God—to go to Him with every little thing, and so live very near Him. I once heard a woman say that she never put a cake into the oven without saying, "Dear God, please see that this is a good cake, and make it rise well!"

When we say our prayers we must not forget to praise God for all His goodness and mercy toward us and all people; to thank Him for all that He does for us and for everybody; as well as to ask Him for His protection and His forgiveness and His patience with us and our shortcomings. And then, during the day we must often speak with God. There is no time when we cannot do so, for God can hear even a thought. How good thoughts must please Him! And good thoughts can become a habit, just as bad thoughts can.

And then, good deeds are a part of true prayer—for if our thoughts are of God and with Him our works will be for Him and through Him. All the bright angels of God will help us if we set out to do right; we are never alone then—think of all that mighty Company behind us, helping our weak little hands and hearts along! Truly, we ought to be able to do good!—Shepherd's Arms.

Eva and the Bear.

There was a circus in town. Eva strolled down to the gate. There was a queer brown dog in a thick fur coat coming along the road. When he came opposite Eva he stopped and looked at her.

Eva wasn't at all frightened. She only said out loud:

"Why! it is a dear beautiful little bear just like the one in my picture book."

The bear did not say anything. He was looking at the stick of molasses candy Eva was holding.

"Do you want some?" she asked, holding it out toward him. He did want some. He pulled it out of her hand, and, sitting down on the grass, began to eat it.

"It was not polite, dear, to take the whole of it," said the little girl, sitting down beside him and putting her arm around his neck.

Just then Ann happened to look out of the window. She saw Eva sitting there with her arms round a big brown thing that moved, and—that—was—a—bear!

Ann flew down the stairs two steps at a time, Eva's mother followed her, and Eva's father came, too.

"Eva," said Ann, very quietly, "what are you doing?"

"Playing with this dear little bear," said Eva. "He is eating up all my candy, and he is not very polite, but I don't care."

Ann's pocket held everything. The children were all sure of that. Eva was not at all surprised when Ann drew out of it another stick of molasses candy.

"Come and get this," she said.

The bear was not disturbed when Eva left him. He was too busy licking the paw that had been holding the candy.

When Eva took her arm from round the bear's neck, Ann snatched her up, and was half way to the house before the bear had time to turn his head.

Just then a great crowd of men and boys came in sight. When they saw the bear they gave a great shout. When the bear saw them he gave a great growl and started to run away. But he was too late. It took a great deal of shouting and stirring up of the dust to get a chain round the bear's neck, and lead him back into the circus tent.—Mirror.

The Foolish Rose.

While I was walking in the garden one bright morning, a breeze came through and set all the flowers and leaves a-flutter. Now that is the way flowers talk, so I pricked up my ears and listened.

Presently an elder tree said, "Flowers, shake off your caterpillars."

"Why?" said a dozen all together, for they were like some children who always say "Why?" when they are told to do anything.

The elder said: "If you don't they'll gobble you up."

So the flowers set themselves a-shaking till the caterpillars were shaken off.

In one of the middle beds there was a beautiful rose who shook off all but one, and she said to herself: "Oh, that's a beauty! I will keep that one."

The elder overheard her and called: "One caterpillar is enough to spoil you."

"But," said the rose, "look at his brown and crimson fur, and his beautiful black eyes, and scores of little feet. I want to keep him. Surely one won't hurt me."

A few mornings afterwards I passed the rose again. There was not a whole leaf on her. Her beauty was gone; she was all but killed, and had only life enough to weep over her folly, while the tears stood like dewdrops on the tattered leaves.

"Alas! I didn't think one caterpillar would ruin me."

One sin indulged has ruined many a boy and girl. This is an old story, but a true lesson.—Morning Star.

How the Woodpecker Got Its Red Head.

There was an old woman who lived all alone on a hill. She wore a black dress and a big white apron with bows behind and an odd little red bonnet on her head.

The little old woman was very, very selfish, for, you see, she lived alone and had nobody to think of except herself. One day she was baking cakes. A tired, hungry man came and asked for one, but the selfish woman thought they were too nice and big to give away.

She broke off a little piece of dough and baked it, but when it was done she thought it, too, was too nice for a beggar. She kept on baking smaller and smaller pieces until she tried a piece no larger than a pin's head. But this, also, was as nice and brown as the others. So the old woman was going to give the hungry man a dry crust, but before she could wink an eye he was gone.

Then she knew she had done wrong and was sorry.

"Oh, I wish I were a bird," she said; "I would fly to him with the finest cake on the shelf."

As she spoke she felt herself getting smaller and smaller until the wind carried her up the chimney. She had become a bird as she wished, but she still wore, and wears even to this day, her black dress and white apron and the little red bonnet on her head.

Because, when she became a bird, she pecked her food from the wood of trees, people ever since have called her the red-headed woodpecker.—Selected.

For the Southern Churchman.
I've Thought of Somebody.

I've thought of somebody—of two persons, two men. They traveled with a great multitude of God's people by a long hard way through a strange land. On one occasion they were sent ahead of the people to find out what sort of country lay beyond. One of them was very stout-hearted, and encouraged the people to push on and possess the land. The other, too, was a brave man, and he afterwards became a great judge and leader. These two men were the only persons of all the multitude that lived to see the end of the great journey on which they were all bound.

Who were the men?

Answer to last week's question: Ab-salom.

Why Betty Didn't Laugh.

"When I was at a party," said Betty (aged just four),

"A little girl fell off her chair, right down upon the floor,

And all the other little girls began to laugh but me;

I didn't laugh one single bit," said Betty, seriously.

"And why didn't you laugh?" said mamma, full of delight to find

That Betty, bless her little heart! had been so sweetly kind.

"Why didn't you laugh, my darling, or don't you like to tell?"

"I didn't laugh," said Betty, "cause 'twas me that fell."

Thought.

Every day we are becoming more and more like our thoughts. What we are today is the outcome of the thoughts we have cherished in the past, while the thoughts that we are cherishing today are determining what we shall be in the future. If our thoughts are low and base and ignoble, then we ourselves are becoming low and base and ignoble. If our thoughts are pure and clean and Christ-like, then we are becoming pure and clean and Christ-like. If we could look into the chambers of your imagination and observe what is taking place there, the thoughts you carry about with you, the desires and ambitions of your heart, the stuff of which your dreams are composed, we could prophesy with the utmost confidence the kind of person you are becoming and therefore the kind of person you shall be. It is in the light of such a fact as this that we see the significance of Paul's exhortation: "Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honorable, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report; if there be any virtue and if there be any praise, think on these things." Think on these things, and we ourselves will become true and honorable and just and pure. It is particularly important that parents realize the truth of this. And yet how few of them apparently do? How many parents there are who are careful as to the food their children eat and the water they drink, but who are indifferent to the books they read, the movies they attend, the companions with whom they associate. No doubt we should exercise due care as to what we take into our bodies, but it is infinitely more important that we take heed to the thoughts that enter our minds.—The Presbyterian.

Guizot once wrote in an album, "I have learned in my long life two rules of prudence: the first is to forgive much, and the second is never to forget." Under this Thiers wrote, "A little forgetting would not detract from the sincerity of the forgiveness.—J. R. Miller.

Barnesville, Md., May 31, 1918.

Christ Church Guild learns with deep regret of the sudden loss by death of its rector, the Rev. J. Augustine Smith, which, in the providence of God, sorely afflicts us. His life in our midst had proven him a man in whom there was no guile; a Christian minister whose ideals were adorned with classical study, human interest and holy aspiration; a priest whose ministrations were a pious oblation for all mankind.

We extend our sympathies to his bereaved, to his parish and to his Bishop. May God's loving mercy moderate our loss.

Resolved, That this remembrance of love be entered upon the records of this Guild, and otherwise published so as to give expression to our appreciation of this devoted rector.

MISS JULIA BELT,

MRS. C. R. DARBY,

MRS. T. O. WHITE,

MISS SALLIE E. BROWN.

Minute on the Death of Bishop Randolph by the Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Education Society in Virginia, adopted on June 5, 1918.

"The Society has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Bishop Randolph, who during the nearly sixty years of his ministry has been closely identified with the Theological Seminary and High School. To the work of the Board of Trustees of the Education Society he has always given the value of his experience during the many years of his connection with the Society. Not only the Society, but the whole Church, will feel his loss; but the inspiration of his life and ministry will abide. It has touched the lives of many of the men who have been trained by the aid of the Society, and we feel that, though he has entered into his rest, his influence will be found in the men of this generation who have known and loved him. The Board desires to convey to the family of Bishop Randolph their sympathy in this hour of their sorrow, and to assure them of their prayer that God may comfort them with the comfort that comes from above.

"Resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent to the family of Bishop Randolph, and be published in the Southern Churchman."

Lost and Found.

Though we long, in sin-wrought blindness,

From Thy gracious paths have strayed,

Cold to Thee and all Thy kindness,

Willful, reckless, or afraid;

Through dim clouds that gather round us

Thou hast sought and Thou hast found us.

Oft from Thee we veil our faces,

Children-like, to cheat Thine eyes;

Sin, and hope to hide the traces;

From ourselves, ourselves disguise,

'Neath the webs enwoven round us

Thy soul-piercing glance has found us.

Sudden, 'midst our idle chorus,

O'er our sin Thy thunders roll,

Death his signal waves before us,

Night and terror take the soul;

Till through double darkness round us

Looks a star—and Thou hast found us.

O, most merciful, most holy,

Light Thy wanderers on their way;

Keep us ever Thine, Thine wholly,

Suffer us no more to stray!

Cloud and storm oft gather round us;

We were lost, but Thou hast found us.

—F. T. Paigrave.

Eric M. Tasman, presented by the Rev. H. E. S. Somerville, was advanced to the priesthood, and Mr. Elliot F. Talmadge, presented by the Rev. George Gunnell, was ordained to the diaconate. The sermon was preached by the Rev. David Felix Davies, D. D., of Bexley Hall Seminary, Gambier, Ohio.

In the Memorial Church of the Advocate, Philadelphia, on Trinity Sunday, the Bishop advanced the Rev. Earl Wentworth Huckel to the priesthood, and Messrs. Edwin Valentine Gray, Arthur Murray, Jr., George Elmer Boswell, Bayard Heylen Goodwin, and Albert Hyde Holt were ordered deacons. The sermon was preached by the Rev. George Lynde Richardson, D. D. On Tuesday morning, May 28th, Mr. Duane Wevill was ordered deacon by Bishop Rhinelander in Old Christ Church, the Rev. L. C. Washburn, D. D., rector, and the sermon was preached by the Bishop. Mr. Wevill was formerly a member of the Reformed Episcopal Church.

In Trinity Church, Geneva, N. Y., on Wednesday, May 29, an unusual ordination service was held, the Rt. Rev. Frederick Courtney, D. D., acting

TRY THIS FOR YOUR HEALTH.

For diseases which do not readily yield to treatment, such as chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, rheumatism, Bright's disease, gall stones, uric acid poisoning, and diseases of the kidney and liver, the best physicians send their wealthy patients to the famous mineral springs. Some even spent months at the Spas of Europe and were almost invariably cured or greatly benefited.

I believe that the Shivar Spring is the greatest mineral spring ever discovered and I believe it so firmly that I offer to send you enough water for a three weeks' treatment (two five-gallon demijohns) on my guarantee that if it fails to benefit your case I will refund the price. You would hardly believe me if I told you that only about two out of a hundred, on the average, say that they have received no benefit. The water is restoring thousands. It restored my thought my case was incurable and I am willing and anxious for you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocketbook. If I win you become a life friend of the Spring. If I lose I will be sorry for you, but I will appreciate your courtesy in giving the water a trial and will gladly refund your money on request. Sign the following letter:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64-C, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial in accordance with instructions contained in the booklet you will send, and if I report no benefit, you agree to refund the price of the water in full on receipt of the two empty demijohns which I agree to return within thirty days.

for Bishop Brent. Six candidates were presented, five of whom were graduates of the De Lancey Divinity School. It was the largest class ever graduated in the history of the school. The Rev. Dr. Charles A. Jessup preached the sermon. Those who were ordered deacons were: Squire B. Schofield, presented by the Rev. Philip W. Mosher; Ferd Goldsmith, presented by the Rev. David L. Leach, and Charles A. Dawdell, presented by the Rev. John B. Hubbs, D. D. Those who were advanced to the priesthood were the Rev. William E. Nixon, presented by the Rev. Mr. Mosher; the Rev. William A. Brown, presented by Dr. Hubbs, and the Rev. Richard Warne, presented by the Rev. Charles H. Smith, D. D.

What Nuxated Iron is Made From

Sworn Statement of Composition of its Formula

It increases the strength and endurance of delicate, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks time in many instances.

The Board of Directors have authorized the broadest publication of the sworn statement of the composition of Nuxated Iron, one of the most widely used tonic, strength and blood builders in the world, so that the public may examine it for themselves and judge as to its merits.

It is conservatively estimated that this remarkable formula is now being used by over 3,000,000 people annually in America alone. Among those who have used and strongly endorse it are many physicians formerly connected with well-known hospitals, distinguished U. S. Army Generals (Retired), Judge Atkinson of the United States Court of Claims at Washington and former Health Commissioner Kerr, of Chicago.

Newspapers everywhere are invited to copy this statement for the benefit of their readers. It is suggested that physicians make a record of it and keep it in their offices so that they may intelligently answer questions of patients concerning it. Everybody is advised to cut it out and keep it. A copy of the actual sworn statement will be sent to any one who desires such. It is as follows:

Iron Peptonate (Special specific Standard) Quantity given below.
Sodium Glycerophosphates U.S.P.

Calcium Glycerophosphates U.S.P.
(Monsanto.)

P. E. Nux Vomica U.S.P.

Cascarin Bitter
Magnesium Carbonate

Po. Ginger U.S.P.

Oil Cassia Cinnamon U.S.P.

Calcium Carbonate Precip. U.S.P.

Each dose of two tablets of Nuxated Iron contains one and one-half grains of organic iron in the form of iron peptonate of a special specific standard which in our opinion possesses superior qualities to any other known form of iron. By using other makes of Iron Peptonate we could have put the same quantity of actual iron in the tablets at less than one-fourth the cost to us, and by using metallic iron we could have accomplished the same thing at less than one-twelfth the cost; but by so doing we must have most certainly impaired their therapeutic efficacy. Glycerophosphates used in Nuxated Iron is one of the most expensive tonic ingredients known. It is especially recommended to build up the nerve force and thereby increase brain power, as gly-cago, former House Surgeon cephosphates Jefferson Park Hospital, Chi- are said to contain phosphorus in a state very similar to that in which it is found in the nerve and brain cells of man.

As will be seen from the above, two important ingredients of Nuxated Iron (Iron Peptonate and Glycerophosphates) are very expensive products as compared with most other tonics.

Under such circumstances the temptation to adulteration and substitution by unscrupulous persons, is very great and the public is hereby warned to be careful and see every bottle is plainly labeled "Nuxated Iron" by the Dae Health Laboratories, Paris, London, and Detroit, U. S. A., as this is the only genuine article. If you have taken other forms of iron without success, this does not prove Nuxated Iron will not help you. We guarantee satisfaction to every purchaser or your money will be refunded.

In regard to the value of Nuxated Iron, Dr. A. J. Newman, late Police Surgeon of the City of Chicago, and former House Surgeon Jefferson Park Hospital, Chicago, says it has proven through his own tests of it to excel any preparation he has ever used for creating red blood, building up the nerves and strengthening the muscles. Dr. J. W. Armistead, Grove Hill, Ala., graduate of the University of Alabama School of Medicine, Mobile, 1883, says: "In the cases I used Nuxated Iron, I have found more beneficial results than from any preparation I have ever used in 34 years' practice." Dr. R. B. Baugh, Polkville, Miss., graduate of the Memphis Hospital College, Memphis, 1898, says: "I always prescribe Nuxated Iron where a reconstructive tonic is indicated." Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of delicate, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks' time.

NOTE: Nuxated Iron is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. Nuxated Iron is not recommended for use in cases of acute illness, but only as a tonic, strength and blood builder. (In case of illness always consult your family physician and be guided by his advice.) If in doubt as to whether or not you need a tonic, ask your doctor, as we do not wish to sell you Nuxated Iron if you do not require it. If you should use it and it does not help you, notify us and we will return your money. It is sold by all druggists. Dae Health Laboratories, Detroit, Mich.

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

sake to do it, as though I enjoyed it, is to be made a better man. Something that is a great delight to me knocks at my door. To make the best of it is not only to enjoy it heartily, but "heartily as unto the Lord," who let me have it. Then by my joys I am made a better man. Making Hard Work Easy.

Most of us love to work—if we can choose our work. And most of us cannot choose our work. We are confronted with the unpleasant necessity of doing lots of things we would not choose to do. Some of them are genuinely difficult; they tax the uttermost resources of our mind or body or spirit. Have we learned the secret of doing them in the easiest way? Here it is: the easiest time to do a hard thing is the first time it comes to you. If you set it aside to do later, merely because it is hard, the next time you come to it it will be twice as hard. And if you push it aside then, the third time you come to it it will be, not three times, but about nine times as hard; the difficulty increases in a multiplying progression. For our whole nature recoils increasingly from taking up that which we have already postponed because we knew it was hard; and now the difficulty piles up in a mountainous way. So the easiest way to get the hardest work done is, "Do it now."—Sunday School Times.

The time of temptation is a cheerless and dreary hour, when everything seems at a standstill, and the spiritual pulse can no longer be felt, it beats so faintly to the outward touch; but if the will is faithful and true, and the soul patient, the life is really concentrating itself, and rallying its forces within. . . . There have been moderate Christians, there have been shallow Christians, without very much temptation; but there never yet was a saintly Christian, never yet one who pressed to the higher summits of the spiritual life, never one whose banner bore the strange device, "Excelsior," who was not made the victim of manifold temptation.—Dean Goulburn.

They that bow their heads before God may hold them erect before the world.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Sunday is a priceless privilege which men are ready to throw away.

He that goes before the cloud of God's providence goes on a fool's errand.

The hero's creed: There is something better than life and something worse than death.

The greatest prosperity that a man can have from God is the gift of a heart that loves to give.

God in His own good time and in His own way rights every wrong, whether it be of men or of nations.

If you would live as Christ would live if He had your opportunity, don't spend much time looking for an easy place.

If God gave us favors without constraining us to pray for them we should never know how poor we are; but a true prayer is an inventory of wants, a catalogue of necessities, a revelation of hidden poverty.—Spurgeon.

Strong souls within the present live. The future veiled, the past forgot; Grasping what is, with hands of steel, They bend what shall be to their will: And, blind alike to doubt and dread, The End, for which they are, fulfil.
—Goeth.

Our pilgrimage, long as it may be, or short, if we have walked in Christ, will leave us by the throne of God; our partial knowledge if we have looked upon all things in Christ, will be lost in open sight; our little lives perfected, purified, harmonized in him whom we have trusted, will become in due order parts of the one divine life, when God is all in all.—Westcott.

Those who are perplexing themselves about questions of duty may learn a salutary lesson from considering that their times are in God's hand. It is the ordinary plan of divine Providence to make the path of duty plain little by little. We cannot determine to-day what we ought to do next year, or even next week. Much anxiety would be avoided if men would simply follow the light they have.—Henry A. Boardman.

Message of the War.

"What is being taught by the war? The crisis has revealed many faults in our character of which we were partly aware: our lack of preparation for an emergency, our amateurishness in dealing with great problems, our unwillingness to think things out; the culpable lightness with which we have taken our imperial responsibilities, our engrossment with material interests, our selfishness as classes and individuals, our extravagance and love of luxury and excessive indulgence in amusements; our inadequate support of Foreign Missions, the vagueness of our religion, and our dislike of spiritual effort."—A Message for the Supreme Moment, Bishop of London.

"Oh, heart of mine, you shouldn't worry so; What we've missed of calm, we couldn't have, you know; What we've met of storm and pain, And of sorrow's driving rain, We can better meet again, should it blow.

For we know not every morrow can be sad:

"So, forgetting all the sorrow we have had,

Let us put aside our fears, And lay by our foolish tears.

So, through all the comin' years, just be glad."

Cast Thy Burden Upon the Lord.

To every one on earth God gives a burden to be carried down The road that lies between the cross and crown; No lot is wholly free; He giveth one to thee.

Thy burden is God's gift. And it will make the bearer calm and strong;

Yet, lest it press too heavily and long, He says "Cast it on Me, And it shall easy be."

It is the lonely road That crushes out the light and life of Heaven;

But borne with Him the soul, restored, forgiven,

Sings out, through all the days,

Her joy and God's high praise.

—Marianne Farningham.

A Petition.

Lord, let there be no room within my heart

But for these three:

My work, my love and Thee, Of each a part.

For if I do my work as in Thy sight, And love all men That Thou hast loved me, sure then I shall do right.

—Louisa Brooke.

Let none stand back as if their sins were too great to be forgiven, or their case too bad to be cured, Jesus is advocate who never lost a cause, a Physician who never lost a patient.—Dr. Guthrie.

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN,
Richmond, Va.

Extract From the Report of the Committee on the State of the Church to the Council of Southern Virginia, May 29, 1918.

* * * Never was the pastoral office so rich in opportunities to comfort, to cheer, to teach and to inspire. In this hour the Clergy have somehow been given a position of acknowledged leadership in every community. Under the pressure of events the old conventions that tended to shut up a minister within the bounds of his parish, have disappeared. Never was it more necessary for the Clergy to remember that they were ordained to minister in spiritual things. The reverent worship of the Church's service affords earth's best refuge from the turmoil of the mind, and the sacrament opens the channel to strength and confidence. Amid the babel of many strange tongues, God's man must proclaim the eternal truths. The urgency of pressing need ought not to obscure for a moment the light of the blessed Gospel of Christ. There is real danger lest the persistent demand that the Church give itself to practical things during the war, if followed blindly, should leave the Church at the end of the war only an organized philanthropy or the mouthpiece of government.

Patriotism becomes a ruthless thing unless it cherish a redemptive purpose for the race; and philanthropy becomes but mechanical alms-giving unless it learn from Him whose touch had power to heal mind and body alike.

The real issues of the war are in their final analysis theological issues. The truths that are questioned are God's fatherhood of the race, the validity of Christ's claim to the headship of humanity and the source of life and strength in the spirit of truth. The easy, amiable creed that held out the salvation of the individual soul as a gift of God to win the allegiance of a rebellious child, has lost its attractive power. The world has been ushered into the presence of the God of history. His face is strange to a generation that has been impatient of theological teaching. To-day men are asking, like Philip, "Show us the Father," and the minister who has found no time in the press of parish activities for study or thought, is either dumb or helpless. The pulpit affords unmeasured opportunity for him who has climbed the mount of vision. No shallow criticism of passing events and no frantic inciting to philanthropic works can satisfy the deep yearnings of the world for God. If the Clergy are to be free from the haunting sense of spiritual incompetency, they must sink a shaft, artesian-wise, down through the silt of surface knowledge and through the rock of ancient prejudice till they find the rich veins of the water of life whose source is the throne of God.

The manifold activities of the Red Cross and the canteen strvice have brought a new joy into lives that have just discovered that service brings the one blessedness of life. It is for the Church to see that this knowledge, gained in the hours of pain and anxiety, be not allowed to spend itself in just one splendid mood of self-sacrifice, but be grasped and held as a basic principle of Christian living.

The power of educational ideals either for good or ill has been startlingly apparent by the spectacle of a whole nation, Germany, committed to false ideals in patriotism, and hostile to every truth that their fathers professed just because the youth of the nation were nurtured for a generation upon false notions of God and man. One of the great lessons of the war is the truth of the paramount importance of the nurture of youth. This truth, already partially understood, will be more clearly defined, we doubt not, in the emphasis upon Christian ideals of conduct and life in the schools of the Church. Christian education, under the wise leadership of your Committee on Religious Education, has broadened the use of the term that tended to confine itself to the instruction in the Sunday-school alone and has endeavored to awaken interest in the systematic study of God's Word on the part of adults within the Church.

Social service, which is the modern name for the ancient Christian virtue of helpful sympathy for the weak and fallen, has found a large field of activity in aiding the officers of the government in protecting those who wear the uniform and are the custodians of the nation's honor, both here and abroad.

The Diocese, as also the general

Church, is facing at this time a serious situation in the fact that there are so few candidates for the ministry. The fact that the call to arms has summoned some who were already at the seminaries, and others who were looking forward to the ministry, must not obscure the fact that this condition antedated the nation's entrance into the war. With a suddenness that left us dazed at first the nation spoke, and we awoke to the realization that those things that we counted peculiarly our own, the earnings of endeavor and the sons of our home, belong to our country. The interesting thing about it all is that this new experience has given a dignity and worth to wealth which it did not have before; and has added to parenthood a sanctity and glory that sheds a new radiance over the home.

This experience that has come to us as citizens of America furnishes us with the language with which we can measure the expression of our loyalty as citizens of the commonwealth of God. God claims as of old the son of the home as His appointed messenger, and He who gave to us the power to get wealth, claims that wealth to be used for the upbuilding of the waste places in our own country and for the spread of the Gospel in foreign lands. The Church needs men for service in its ministry and needs a fuller and nobler use of our wealth in the mission work of the Church.

A word spoken in due season, how good it is. There is the word of warning; the word of encouragement; the word of sympathy; the word of congratulation; the word of explanation and apology. To be in any sense "a son of consolation," to be able to make life a little sweeter for others, good a little easier, evil a little more hated and despised, this would be a high privilege for the oldest as well as the youngest among us. Words can do much in this Christian work. Think of the blessing involved in these words of Isaiah: "The Lord hath given me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary." If God has not given to each of us the tongue of the learned, He has given to each, if we will but use it, the tongue of truth, of kindness, of purity, of sympathy."—H. M. Butler.

No Religion?

By the Rev. Charles Josiah Adams.

Alounge in his study, the portals ajar,
The curtains drawn back, windows open as far
As open they would, he was courting a breeze
Which whitened the leafings of tall poplar trees,
Surrounding a rectory deep-porticoed,
A little aback from a wide country road,
Where, parting plantations, a long valley down,
It enters the street of a tumble-down town—
A town just returning to usual norm,
Of social, religious, work-a-day form—
A town in which lately the pestilent breath
Was everywhere breathing of dread
Yellow Death:
Whose coming perceived, all the able had flown,
Excepting the Rector—him leaving alone,
The blacks and poor-whites to attend
as he might,
While living, when dying, dead hiding from sight!

Alounge in his study—though pleasant
'twould be
That evening forth, in the open, the free!
Disposed to avoiding the twitch of the pain

He'd recently suffered, again and again,
Of being avoided, in possible where,
Of turned-away face, of dead-cutting stare,
Of meeting the ones of the smile and
the smirk,
Who, secretly, ever belittled his work—
Though little he prized it, conceiving, at most,
That nothing he'd done but to stand at his post,
To do, in the Name of the Master, the thing
He'd vowed him to do, whatsoever it bring!
Belittled his work and, the more to their shame,
In whispers, with grins, were befouling his fame!
All coming of this: that in danger he'd stayed,
While they in a panic—away they had made!

And there, in his lounging, he's fully compensed
For dangers he's run—for indignities sensed!

A negro is speaking—melodious flow!
Who, reaching his climax, expresses him so:

"Dese 'Pisco-er-lopian preachers is level!

'Hain't got no religion?" — Hain't

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

PROGRESS TOWARD UNITY:— WHAT MUST WE GIVE UP?

In a letter published in our issue of last week a correspondent finds fault with recent utterances of two of our Bishops on the subject of Church unity because of a lack of definiteness. He thinks, moreover, that this has been characteristic of the whole discussion of this question in the past, and on this account is inclined to underestimate, as it seems to us, the results that have already been gained. We quote a single paragraph:

"For twenty years there has been going on what may be called an acute discussion about Church unity, and so far as one can see there has been absolutely no progress toward any result. It seems to me that the cause of this failure of any result is the fact that the discussion abounds in vagueness, and that not one of the churches says plainly what it is willing to surrender, and what it will not under any circumstances surrender. No one will define what is or what is not an unimportant thing."

With our correspondent's closing plea for a "daring definiteness, which . . . will at least bring us to some conclusion," we are quite in accord. We cannot, however, agree with two propositions expressed or implied in the above paragraph.

We think there has been a very remarkable progress made within the past twenty years towards the desired end. Twenty years ago, or a little more, the subject of Church unity was one that in most quarters could hardly gain a hearing. It was considered at best as the idle dream of a few visionaries, and at worst was looked upon as an adroit move for denominational advantage or a flank attack upon the fortress of Christian liberty. Even in our own Church it was held by some to be an undesirable, and by many more to be an impossible, thing; and this was the almost universal opinion in the Christian bodies around us. Official exchanges in regard to it were cautious and diplomatic in tone, evincing little enthusiasm and creating less.

Today there is arising an insistent demand for something practical in the way of unity. More and more it is being acknowledged as the vital issue before the Christian world and is discussed as a matter of universal interest. Thinking men are asking, not why? but how? And it is not alone the exigencies of the hour which the war has brought about nor the foreseen problems which will face the Christian Church when the war is over which has produced the change. Devout men have been thinking, praying, about this thing, and here and there have been taking counsel one with another in regard to it. Like a seed taking root in the earth the conviction has been slowly growing that unity is not only desirable but necessary, that it ought to be possible and must be attempted. The Spirit of Truth, we doubt not, has been leading thoughtful men by divers means to larger and deeper views, preparing them to receive the lessons which the events of this day of the Lord are making so peremptory. And on a nearer view, considered as a practical necessity, if the Church of God is to fulfil her mission in a new world, the subject is seen with a new perspective. Old and formal ideas are becoming plastic and broader impressions are being gained. Less is being looked for from quadrilaterals and platforms and federations and conferences, and more from an awakened spirit, a wider outlook and a truer consciousness of her world-wide mission in the Church at large.

If our view of what is taking place in the mind of the Church is correct the matter assumes an aspect of the utmost hopefulness. No one can doubt that this is the promising method of approach, not by way of academic discussion and jealously guarded proposal and counter-proposal but by way of a Spirit-impelled determination to overpass the obstacles which hinder and the conditions which weaken her in the accomplishment of an imperative and God-given task. When this determination has been gained, from the force of a growing conviction within answering to the logic of compelling circumstances without, then unity will come, not by conventions or by compromise but by wide and willing consent.

It is a matter of congratulation then and not of criticism that "not one of the churches says plainly what it is willing to surrender." Why should any one of them be asked to surrender anything? Can it be supposed that unity will come by any such process? It was by insisting that men should surrender something that they had learned to esteem or held to be true that disunion and disruption arose. The process must be reversed if unity is to be restored. Provided only "that the substance of the Faith be kept entire" the thing to be sought is not uniformity but diversity in unity. Whatever the Lord has given or allowed to any man or set of men in the liberty of the gospel which to him or them has been found spiritually helpful or practically useful, let it be kept and shared with whosoever desires it, no man forbidding and no man compelling. That degree of uniformity which is desirable will be more surely approached in this way than in any other. The things to be surrendered by every Church and party are the things which the New Testament disallows—prejudices and harsh judgments, pride of opinion and narrowness of sympathy with lack of charity and of trust in the self-evidencing power of the truth, the defence of the Faith from behind the bulwarks of partisanship and outworn traditions. Squarely faced, is it not these that are dividing the forces of Christ? And these will be overcome only by the Spirit of God, His people being willing in the day of His power.

A great English preacher once startled his congregation by assuring them that they were as good as they really wanted to be. But the degree of goodness which they wanted was far short of God's desire for them or willingness to bestow. So it is with the unity of His Church. It is as united as it wants to be. But that the desire for unity is growing on every hand is evident, and it is here that progress is first to be marked.

THE DUTY OF THE CLERGY IN THE WAR.

Bishop-Coadjutor F. F. Johnson, of Missouri, in his address to the Convention of that Diocese, discussed among other practical matters a subject which is occasioning much searching of heart among a large number of our clergy

I do not want to traverse again the ground that I covered in that portion of my address which dealt with the war a year ago. But I must plead again, as I did then, that our clergy will not quit their posts here in Missouri until their souls have travelled in pain of prayer to God to know His will. If this war hammers on for years yet, as it may do, who is to comfort the poor widow woman in the cottage down in southeast Missouri into which I went the other day, whose family is three sons and who has three stars on her service flag!—who is to speak comfort to that mother heart if the fateful message comes to her some day that her three boys will never more come home? If we who are sent by Jesus Christ as He was sent by his Father are to forsake our ministry, close our churches, and permit the altars of God to be thrown down, who is to put the spiritual fibre into the lads who must go across a year or two or three from now? I am not speaking now of the clergy who are accepting war appointments over sea or here at home, which enlarge their opportunities for spiritual ministrations to their fellows. I say, "God bless them," as a year ago I said it. But if a minister of this Church, who finds himself in a place where he is making close and strong spiritual contacts with several thousand young men and women at the most critical period of their lives, quits that post and practically lays aside his commission as a minister of the gospel and sails the seas and leaves his important parish here vacant for many months in which he is meeting railway trains in Paris, what shall it profit the nation or the Church? Pardon me if I offend any. But these are the thoughts that arise in me as I inventory my conscience and ask the Holy Spirit to give me a right judgment. Our surgeons go to France not to do the work of laymen, but of surgeons, experienced and skilled. Our nurses go as nurses and to nurse. Ought our clergy to go unless they can follow their profession there and find the opportunity for it enlarged? Sacrifice is of the very essence of our ministry. The sacrifice required of some of us is to stay on this job! We have a right to admire the spirit of sacrifice which takes our brothers to the front. We have a right to listen to the voice of our Great Captain, striving, perhaps, to tell us, if we would listen, that the sacrifice now required of us is to stack our posts just where we are. Right along this line I am profoundly impressed by the answer which Dr. Slattery, rector of big Grace Church, on Broadway, New York, gave the other day when invited by the overseas headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. to give six months' service to the American troops on the western front. After confessing that it was an invitation to "an alluring adventure"; after confessing, "The easiest thing I could have done was to say that I would go," Dr. Slattery says, among other things, in a sermon to his people: "My problem was to discover whether by staying or by going I could best serve my country. . . . I am inclined to think the patriotic need is greater in our East Side homes than in the trenches where the sons of these homes are fighting. . . . From almost every pew of this church has gone a son, a brother, a husband. If I could serve them best by going to France, I should go. But I have a sacred memory of a certain charge which has come from one and another of these men, sometimes definitely spoken, sometimes only intimated by a glance: it is the charge that I look out for the one who cares most and who must stay at home. . . . I have said again and again that the greatest heroes are those who send with an unutterable love from their homes those who go. I have wondered if I appeared in France before one of these men, I should not find a look of reproach, with the question, 'When did you last see my mother, my father, my wife?' . . . And so I knew that for the present at least I must stay here."

Dear brothers in the ministry, these words of Dr. Slattery are very moving words, it seems to me.

If you are not to go across, won't each of my clergy keep an honor roll hung in some conspicuous place in church so that worshippers can see it as they come and go? It should contain the names of the men and women of that congregation who are in the service of their country. And won't you have a service flag? Won't you write a letter once a month if possible to those who have gone forth from your congregation? It will be good for each one to feel that you are still his pastor and that you care. And at every service won't you offer at least one prayer for those gone to the war that God will protect them from the violence of enemies and from every other evil? The boys at the front will be strengthened with all grace by God's spirit in the inner man if in your letters you tell them that prayers are made unceasingly unto God for them. And fathers and mothers will feel a new appreciation of the Church which follows their boys with its loving prayers.

OUR FOREIGN CHURCHES.

Mr Editor:

As Chairman of the Commission on American Churches in Europe, I am constrained to draw the attention of your readers to the great need of sympathetic help, especially for Holy Trinity Church, Paris, and St. James' Church, Florence. Letters from Bishop Israel and the Rev. Mr. Wadleigh tell of the inevitable deficit in the receipts for the work of those parishes, unless an appeal is made to Americans who have enjoyed the privileges of those parishes when they were journeying abroad, to come to the rescue in this emergency. So many persons belonging to those parishes are no longer there, and so extensive has been the help given by our clergy and people in Paris and Florence not only to refugees, but also to soldiers who attend the services (especially in Paris, in large numbers), that with the utmost economy, cutting down all expenses, the Vestries of these Churches find themselves facing great difficulties.

The Commission on American Churches in Europe, at a meeting in January, appointed a Committee to further the interests of these parishes, of which Mr. Francis Lynde Stetson, 15 Broad Street, New York City, is Secretary. No doubt many have read the appeals of Bishop Israel and the Rev. Mr. Wadleigh, both of which the Commission emphatically endorses, and prays that some contributions be made in order that our work in these foreign lands may not come to naught. Fifteen thousand dollars is needed this year for the Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris; and at least $5,000 for St. James' Church, Florence. Are there not some who will gladly and generously respond?

CORTLANDT WHITEHEAD.
Pittsburgh, Pa., June 12, 1918.

AN APPRECIATION OF BISHOP RANDOLPH.

Mr. Editor: There is still room for an appreciation of the late Bishop Randolph from the strictly Yankee point of view. It is now nineteen years since I met that dear Bishop of God's Church. When at college in Salem, Va., I seized the first opportunity to hear him preach. He came to St. John's Church, Roanoke, first. Southern hospitality was shown me there when I wandered up the isle looking for a seat. Mr. and Mrs. Glasgow (he is now among the three great lawyers of Philadelphia) kindly invited me into their seat. After service I met for the first time that greatest of all preachers I have ever heard. A year later I dined in his house in Norfolk, after which he walked with me to the wharf, where I took steamer for Boston. He seemed interested in me because I came from the Diocese of his friend, Bishop Brooks. Bishop Randolph had also been one of the consecrators of Bishop Lawrence. There were little things that all together made him feel that I was a link with a part of his past, and made me feel that he was a real saint of God, interested in helping any and all with whom he came in contact. I have made it a practice to hear him preach every time it was possible. During the Convention of 1910 in Cincinnati he preached for my old friend, Custis Fletcher, in a nearby Kentucky town, and the Bishop had the same power and ability that he had ever shown. While he read all the sermons he ever preached in my hearing, he never caused me to think of anything but his thought and just what he meant it to convey to every hearer. His voice, his power of touching the better side of man were gifts of the Holy Spirit. No preacher that I have ever heard has had the gifts of that saintly Bishop. His biography may be written by a close friend, but, as Bishop Tucker has said, no one will be able to get the right view or impression of him unless God has already given that view and impression by association and frequent contact. May his presence remain with us who knew him as an incentive to work as efficiently as he did in God's Kingdom.

ALBERT EDWIN CLATTENBURG.
Hazleton, Pa., June 14, 1918.

The real purpose of every home is to shape character for time and for eternity. The home may be one of poverty, the cross of self-sacrifice may be required, suffering may sometimes be necessary, but wherever a home fulfills this purpose it is overflowing with joy.—Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman.

AN APPEAL FOR FRANCE.

My Dear Mr. Editor: The enclosed came to me yesterday, and I am passing it on to you, thinking that perhaps you would like to give it to the public so that people may know about the help which is needed so urgently and which it may give them pleasure to provide.

You will know without my saying it that no assistance that America can render at this moment can be more effectual than to help the men who are fighting for us to be sure that their helpless ones are being ministered to, and I know that you share my desire to do anything in your power to give them this assurance.

Very truly yours,

A. S. LLOYD.

Missions House, New York.

The American Committee for Devastated France, 16 East Thirty-ninth Street, New York, received the following cable on June 8, 1918:

June 5, France—War Zone.

In the field we are evacuating refugees, running dispensaries, feeding thousands of refugees at our rest stations. Army has called upon us to establish mobile canteens in six places.

We are also helping hospital work and furnishing supplies to American wounded. Paris depot clothing refugees as they pass through. Situation grave, but every one calm and confident, with supreme faith in American support. Our American troops magnificent. Our bank account totally drained. We are moving with events, but in desperate need of funds. American Red Cross heart and soul with us, but their transportation greatly overburdened, and we have advantage in having workers and motors already in war zone. Need for immediate financial assistance greater than ever. Vital we should be able to put supplies wherever available and distribute immediately in this emergency. Our children's colony now moved out of war zone. This is one of the most important ends of our work, and must be maintained at all costs. Cable even small sums without delay. Inform all families safely of every member carefully watched.

(Signed) Dike-Morgan.

RIGHT REV. ALFRED MAGILL RANDOLPH.

Extracts From the Memorial Address Before the Council of Southern Virginia, by the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D.

* * * Those great prophets! How they stand out from age to age in the economy of the Kingdom of God. The patriarchs are gone without successors. The power and reality of all priesthood is summed up and finished in the redeeming work and atonement of our Great High Priest, who is passed into the heavens. There is no more offering for sin. The day of kings is passing; He is our King of kings and Lord of lords. But still He sends us prophets, and by His Spirit guides and rules His Church through His apostolic and prophetic ministry. These were united in our great Bishop, whose ministry was most truly apostolic and prophetic. How richly our Diocese has been blessed in this regard. Bishop Moore, Bishop Meade, Bishop Johns, Bishop Whittle, Bishop Randolph—apostolic prophets every one. What a high level as Bishops and prophets they, by the grace of God, maintained for more than a hundred years in this old Commonwealth; and of them all none more truly represented his people ple or more lovingly bore them on his heart than Bishop Randolph. He was in all things of them. Through his father, Robert Lee Randolph, of Fauquier County, he represented a family which in all of its generations, for more than two centuries, has done Virginia and our whole nation eminent and most honorable service. Through his mother, Mary Buckner Magill, he inherited the idealism and the staunch loyalty of the Scotch-Irish blood, to which our land owes many of our greatest heroes, statesmen and divines. But by breeding and affinity, Bishop Randolph was an Eastern Virginian. His home, Eastern View, on the sun-rising side of the Blue Ridge, looked out upon the lower country, which he loved and where his life's work was for the most part to be accomplished. It was fitting that he was educated at the ancient College of William and Mary, where so many of the founders of our Commonwealth had received their mental nurturing. There he did hard and successful work. * * * From William and Mary he entered the Theological Seminary of Virginia, and graduated there in June, 1858, in his twenty-second year.

These were halcyon days in the Church in Virginia. Bishop Meade, and Bishop Johns as his assistant, were at the height of their power and influence in the Church, and presided over the undivided Church in the as yet unviolated and undivided territory of Virginia, from the Ohio river to the sea. The days of humiliation which had come upon the Church in Virginia, during and after the revolution and which lasted for more than two decades in the following century, were all past. The Church was enjoying a time of peace, and was making quiet but steady progress in numbers and in spiritual influence. It was during these peaceful days that Randolph was brought up, educated and began his ministry, and they left their impress upon his character. It was not a time of bustling activity and intricate organization, but of quietness and confidence in the spiritual life. The Diocesan Councils were times of refreshing, and did not go altogether on schedule time. The parochial reports were rather scant and informal, not like ours, cut out after the pattern of big Saul's armor, and therefore frequently a world too wide for the little David who is expected to fill it up. It was such a time as we pray for on the fifth Sunday after Trinity, "that the course of this world may be so peaceably ordered by Thy providence that Thy Church may joyfully serve Thee in all godly quietness." God speed such days again. The Seminary had already attained widespread influence and was enlarging her borders. Aspinwall Hall was built the year Alfred Randolph was ordained deacon, Henry C. Potter and Phillips Brooks were among his friends at the Seminary. There was much earnest preaching in the quiet churches in Virginia, and much faithful parochial work. The movements of the Bishops in the Diocese were not hurried. They frequently spent days in one parish, and the fruits of the Spirit abounded in the Church. The modern type of parish priest, with his manifold and often conflicting duties, his multiplied organizations and equipments, his social, humanitarian, athletic and perhaps political functions crowding upon his religious duties, was not the ideal of that time. Young Randolph's life took form from forces whose emphasis fell quite differently from that which now prevails, and many elements in the ministerial life of to-day were far less prominent or altogether lacking them.

Moreover in those quiet times there still remained, along with his great Bishop Meade, some of those who had stemmed the tide of the Church's adversity, and as honored champions, survived to rejoice in her prosperity. Among those was the saintly Edward C. McGuire, rector of St. George's Church, Fredericksburg. This venerable servant of the Church was now in declining health. His wonderfully blessed ministry of forty odd years was drawing to a close; and Bishop Meade, having ordained Randolph a deacon at the Seminary in June, 1858, sent him in September to assist Mr. McGuire. Randolph was then just twenty-two years old.

We scarcely realize that our dear Bishop, who so recently went in and out among us, was an immediate link between us and that distant past when the revival of the Church in Virginia had not even commenced. Bishop Meade was ordained by Bishop Madison in February, 1811, and Randolph was ordained by Bishop Meade in 1858. Thus the ministries of these two, Bishop Meade and Bishop Randolph, cover one hundred and seven years; and the ministries of the Rev. Edward McGuire and his young assistant, Alfred Randolph, cover one hundred and three years. What a privilege ours has been: In Bishop Randolph we have had as our leader, teacher, example, Bishop, the mature fruits, the finished product of the best and loftiest period of Virginia's social and religious life. In him her best traditions were preserved and handed down, in him her purest manners, her highest principles were nobly exemplified.

* * * Great changes have passed over our land, and in the ways and manners of living and conducting affairs of all sorts, since those days with which Randolph's long life puts us in touch; the days of the men whose fathers laid the foundations of this American republic, and who were themselves the revivers of the Church after the trying ordeals of the Revolution. What simplicity characterized their lives, what vital force and fervor marked their actions. There was little mechanical and very little pronounced ecclesiasticism about them. The day of the functionary with his secretary, his typewriter and his 'questionnaire' was not yet come. They were content to let some things be without making a catalogue of them, to cast the seed of their good words and works like bread upon the waters without any record to be seen or heard of men; "are they not written in Thy book?" The future showed and will show the fruits. Meade, McGuire and the other leaders of that day were no mere functionaries, they were prophets, who, as Erasmus said of Luther, "Spake pure flame." They, like Patrick Henry, perhaps could not always keep their papers quite in order, although Meade was an indefatigable writer and publisher of whatever would be a help to holiness or would preserve truth for posterity; certainly they made little use of red tape, and might write their resolutions on the fly-leaf of a book, but they could uplift and inspire a dying Church. Their spirit, their fidelity, their clear vision, their indomitable courage, their abundant labors saved the day for the Church; and we to-day owe almost the very being and certainly the most valued features of the Church in Virginia to these men.

It is no wonder but a thing to be thankful for that Randolph was a Churchman of that type, and that an evangelical and prophetic ministry was his realized ideal. All the influences of his home and of his training tended to this; the thoroughness of his own thought and spiritual perception would not be satisfied with any less, whatever else might be added; and thus with a background of colonial simplicity and elegance, born to the manner of unquestioned influence and authority, guided ever by the compelling instincts and obligations of Christian chivalry which manifested itself in unconscious dignity, unfailing consideration for others, with ability to adapt himself to any company and any circumstances, he began the work to which in heart and soul he was devoted.

* * * If asked in which of his many talents our great Bishop excelled, I think his people would answer, in preaching the gospel of the love of God. He was an apostle of God's love, and his preaching was of that high order which combined not only evangelical zeal and fervor, the passion for souls and for the spread of the gospel (prime and effective essentials which, God be praised, are not beyond the reach of very limited mental endowments), but to these Bishop Randolph added the best culture in philosophy, with wide and varied attainments in history, poetry and literature, a wonderful command of language, which graced his charming style, a style all his own, and all conveyed in a manner and in tones so natural and so effective that the thought of any artificial cultivation could never be associated with them, it was just Bishop Randolph himself. But it ever seemed to me that the greatest natural gift of this great preacher was that note of genius, the power of true insight into human nature and human character. He knew how to reach, deal with and help human nature because he knew human nature. He was a humble minded man because he knew so much, and knew there was so much more to be known; and the gentle, quiet, almost childish way that he would sit and converse and ask questions, was calculated to deceive one as to what Bishop Randolph really did know. But when he went up on his throne, not that special chair in the chancel, but the pulpit, that was his throne, and turned the light of his insight and his knowledge, like a prophetic seer, on human nature and the things you might have been talking about, things ecclesiastical or things spiritual, then, if we had our wits about us, we would see that we were dealing with one whose perceptions of realities were deeper and broader than the ordinary conventionalities provided for, or were ready to be submitted to. And with it went a wonderful imaginative and dramatic power, not in action but in thought and power of expression, which illumined first one aspect and then another of Divine truth applied to humanity, until we saw, as we had never seen, the depth of the knowledge of the wisdom and of the love of God.

* * * And so to the last, into some home or congregation of his people, where his presence would be prized so highly, he came: It might be among old friends with hallowed associations, or to some great church that had many times thrilled with his voice; it might be to a chapel of his colored people, who were so proud of their portion in their Bishop, and for whose loyalty and simple faith and progress in the things of God he was so thankful; wherever it might be, to the last he came, bringing his distinguished presence, his loving spirit, his gospel message, his apostolic blessing.

We bless and praise God for His servant, our Bishop, Alfred Magill Randolph.

A PEOPLE COME TO THEIR OWN.

On the west coast of Africa a drama is unfolding, silently and without observation, but when it is complete mankind will exclaim, Behold, what God hath wrought. In His providence the God of heaven and earth permitted those who were strong to carry Africans to America and sell them into slavery. After years He put it into the hearts of men who owned their bodies to send back to their own land a small company of these people in whom God had lighted that light which we call the love of liberty. These had been given no part in solving the problems which beset the establishment of free institutions in America. They had merely looked on while others labored, but they had dreamed of their beauty and longed for them. By what we call accident they were sent to the richest spot on the western coast of Africa; and left to themselves in Liberia, they confronted the difficulties and dangers which had hitherto foiled those who had tried to possess themselves of that continent. In the face of obstacles which were all but insuperable, men who had been slaves set themselves to establish in Liberia a republic. A hundred years has not yet elapsed since the experiment was launched. Many obstacles have been overcome. Malicious influences which have combined to defeat the Liberians have so far been successfully combated. In a territory having a population of about two million, of whom less than fifty thousand are civilized, the Republic of Liberia which the first immigrants dreamed of is an established entity, as clearly defined as was our own country when its constitution was framed.

Liberia is by no means a State where irresponsible people are playing at Government and trying to imitate the methods of white men. On the contrary, it is a land where serious and courageous men have devoted themselves to the task of establishing Christian civilization. This statement of fact should be constantly kept in mind, since perhaps the most dangerous, because most insidious obstacles that has confronted Liberia has been the good-natured cynicism with which the civilized world has looked on while she struggled—the matter of course fashion in which the nations have refused to take her seriously. All of us have taken what we heard for granted when men from their own purposes circulated slanders which left the impression that the case of Liberia was hopeless because her foundations were rotten. When men have talked of the inherent incompetency of Liberia's men we have all accepted it, no one taking the trouble to find out what was the truth. Meanwhile, refusing to be discouraged, and shutting their ears to calumny, the Liberians with splendid courage and real ability have labored patiently with the result that they have actually created a country in which a black man naturally, and as a matter of course dependent upon no man and free to develop normally, bears a man's responsibility because his manhood is devoted to that which is his very own and sacred because it means liberty for him and his children.

No man may dare to prophesy, but it is safe to expect that when by God's help Liberia shall have passed safely through the present distress; material development and general education attended by universal regard for law and order will be established throughout its borders. The whole world will see in operation that which until now the whole world has declared to be impossible. Black men will have established themselves under a free government administered by black men. Life and property will be secure. All men will have to confess that the African is a man like other men. The candle which has been lighted in Liberia will shine to the Cape.

Meanwhile Liberia needs the friendship and counsel of a strong nation to show her how to meet her problems and to make her resources available. It goes without saying that America should be that friend. But Liberia needs still more the help of the Church, not only that her character may be fixed, but that she may be made able to develop the uncivilized tribes within her borders. These constitute Liberia's richest asset, but she is not able unaided to make this asset available and God seems to have seen fit to accord this high privilege to the American Church. The blessing not only to Liberia but to herself as the fruit of the help she has rendered in the past seems to be a witness that the work the Church has done has been in accordance with his pleasure. The number of Liberians whom this Church has trained for service in their country is surprising, and the honorable record of these men is ground for reverent thanksgiving. In addition the Church has made large contributions towards developing the national conscience and toward keeping before the people's eyes the ideals upon which democracy will at last be built.

Yet however much Liberia needs and deserves help politically, she needs still more the assistance of the Church that the character of the civilized may be established; her standards fixed and all her people made able to understand the value of Christian institutions. The most difficult and important task confronting her is that of assimilating the uncivilized tribes. These are all virile people and appreciate the profit that attends the security of life and property which civilized government assures them, but they need to be instructed that they may be able to share the responsibility of citizens of a free country; and to be taught the arts of civilization that they may help develop the country's abundant resources. Above all, they must be instructed in the faith upon which all good citizenship depends. To accomplish this would test the strength of a people possessing all the appliances of our age, and rich in material resources. Unfortunately, Liberia is weak in both. She has men and women capable of doing all that is required; indeed, none but Liberians should do it if all the people are to be welded together into one. But the teachers must be made ready by those who already possess the strength which Christian development affords. Only Christians can bring this to them, and God seems to have conferred the privilege on the American Church. The work already done in Liberia by this Church has gained for us the confidence and good-will of the uncivilized as well as the civilized people. A few white men and women properly equipped would have little difficulty in training enough Liberian leaders to establish the good work already begun. And when we remember that the planting of the mission in Liberia was the first practical expression of this Church's faith in the Mission committed to her, and how that first adventure tempted our fathers to plant those branches in the East which today are so vigorous and full of promise; gratitude to God for His favor should be enough to make us keen to finish in Liberia the work which remains to be done before that country can render to Africa the service which is easily within her reach.

During the past twenty-five years the Church in Liberia has been practically left to work out her own destiny. Now she is well established among the civilized and is ministering to the uncivilized more generously than any diocese in the American Church is ministering to the Indians who may dwell within its borders. Nor should it be forgotten that anyone of these dioceses is stronger than the Church in Liberia. Her clergy are clean and devoted men. Her schools are good in spite of the Church's poverty. Her people are worthy and well instructed and considering their poverty are notably generous. In one town a man who occupies high place in the State and whose time is devoted to important interests, has at his own charges carried on continuously through twenty-five years a night school for boys and young men, and he has had the satisfaction of seeing not a few of these establish themselves as positive factors in society. This school has more than a hundred pupils.

Hitherto the help which the American Church has provided has been barely enough to keep the Church in Liberia alive. The time has come when the American Church is challenged to provide such help in men and money as will enable the Church in Liberia to fulfil her mission in Africa. There seems to be nothing to oppose this or prevent the desired end from being accomplished. The whole people, whether civilized or uncivilized, is kindly disposed towards the American Church on account of the service her men and women have rendered. The genius of the Church answers to the ideals of Liberia as to those of America, so that her help will be the more valuable in this, the formative period of the Republic. It was not accident which decreed that our bill of rights and our constitution were the creation of Churchmen. The words of Henry Clay will be true for Liberia as for America. "Her institutions will be safe as long as she has the Book of Common Prayer and the constitution."

Moreover, the conditions attending the Church's Mission in Liberia are unique. In every country not Christian the work for the enlightenment of mankind is carried on by suzerainty. This work is regarded as negligible by the Government. It is tolerated so long as it advances and does not militate against the policies of the Government. It receives the Government's support and countenance when the Government's representative happens to be a man who understands the truth in which civilization rests. In Liberia on the contrary the Government's interests square exactly with the Church's purpose in establishing her mission, since that Government confronts the obligation to reduce to practical application the principles which the Church was sent to proclaim. All that the Church does for her own strengthening must add strength to the Republic. As she fixes Christian standards the republic's problems will be more easily solved. The result is that instead of working in the hope that some day those in authority will understand and accept the Revelation she interprets, the Church in Liberia has the opportunity to help a nation which has received Christianity to realize its ideals. In every other mission of the Church her endeavor is to select and train individuals who may be made able to interpret the principle of life to people whose mode of thought rests in a different concept. In Liberia those who must lead the people have already the Church's point of view and need only to be shown how to apply principles which are already received; with the result that Liberia is ready to furnish competent evangelists and teachers in any number needed for the work, once these have received proper training. Reasonable help through a short term of years in skilled workers and equipment will enable Liberia to realize her aspirations, and schools and industrial training will remove the causes for most of the obstacles which remain in the way of her development.

Interesting as is the challenge to help Liberia in the fine fight she is making on her own behalf, one finds oneself regarding this almost as a detail, as one looks beyond and considers what it will mean to that continent when Africans see a nation expressing the highest human development created and administered by Africans. It happens that Liberia is surpassingly rich in material resources. As might be expected under such conditions, the uncivilized tribes who inhabit Liberia are virile, intelligent and, though enveloped in the darkness which must prevail where men do not know the Father, are lovers of liberty. They are related in race and language to the strong peoples of Central Africa. Their contacts with these are natural and might easily be very near. The effect of what befalls Liberia will be immediately felt among the really great peoples in the interior of Africa. It is thrilling to think of the time when the institutions which Christianity makes possible shall be brought face to face with the institutions of Mohammedanism, where both are expressed in the life of the Africans. The misery which always attends Mohammedanism must disappear just as darkness yields to the light, once the people have seen the fruits of Christian living. Nor is it easy to conceive of any other means by which the cruelty of that system may be rationally met, than by showing to the people who suffer under it the difference between human life bound by ignorance and superstition and the same life when it has been developed in the light of the Revelation which has illumined the world.

To make Liberia ready for this beautiful adventure is the privilege of the American Church. In spite of the solemn responsibility laid upon the Church to help our Nation successfully meet its obligation to civilization, she must not turn away from this almost romantic undertaking. Nor should it be delayed. When peace comes and small nations have their safety secured, and nations have at last gained the privilege of working out their own development unmolested, the Church should be seriously at work in Liberia helping that country to be ready for the new and larger tasks which will devolve upon her. The only thing that is needed, as men speak, is that it should take hold of the task generously and with a ready will to support the work. The Bishop whom the Head of the Church will teach His Body to choose for Liberia should take with him to meet immediate needs at least as much money as the Church gave the first Bishop she sent to Manila. The men and the women who must go with him to help and to guide the Liberian Church should be generously provided for. No undue apprehension need be felt on account of the health of these if proper provision is made to enable them to live in conditions that are not impossible. Liberia presents no menace to health which does not of necessity go with a tropical climate. Indeed it is free from many of the most dreaded forms of tropical disease. The impression we have received with regard to the deadliness of Liberia's climate is largely due to the ignorance of the Church which sacrificed her sons and daughters by not making proper provision for their welfare. Fit habitations and short terms of service will meet successfully the difficulties and dangers, and these needs may be readily met.

Church Intelligence

To Stimulate Interest in Unity.

At the instance of the Association for the Promotion of Christian Unity, it is requested that at all gatherings of Christians throughout the summer and fall there may be passed such resolutions regarding the unity of Christendom as will deepen the interest in this great cause, the reports of this action to be sent to the journals of the respective communions.

Meeting of the Executive Committee of the Board of Missions.

An unusually large attendance marked the June meeting of the Executive Committee of the Board of Missions.

The Treasurer's report, which is always one of great interest, showed a decrease in offerings of $46,559. This decrease can be traced almost entirely to falling off in parish offerings, which may in turn be traced to the extra months in the fiscal year. Under the old plan, about this time parishes would be making a strenuous effort to pay up their appointments. Now, however, with December 31st as the date of the closing of the fiscal year, it is to be presumed from the report that they are waiting until the early fall to make this effort. There must be taken into consideration also the many other appeals that have come up, which have, undoubtedly, lessened the emphasis placed in many parishes upon the raising of the apportionments.

In the domestic field, the resignations of Miss Frances M. Young as United Offering worker in Arizona, and Miss Myrtle Candill in Asheville, were accepted.

The appointment of Miss Florence L. Everett as teacher in St. Elizabeth's School for Indians in South Dakota, was approved.

An appropriation was made to aid the Bishop of Wyoming to place a clergyman in charge of the Mission at Lusk.

The Educational Secretary brought to the attention of the Executive Committee a proposed conference of students of the Episcopal Church to be held this year. The Board of Missions, in conjunction with the General Board of Religious Education and the Joint Commission on Social Service, was asked to share the traveling expenses of the delegates attending this Council. The Board regretted that it felt unable to make such an appropriation. It did, however, appoint William C. Sturgis, Ph. D., Educational Secretary, and Deaconess Henrietta Goodwin, the Student Secretary, as its representatives on the Council.

In the Latin American field, a loan of $3,000 from the $100,000 fund set aside from the Undesignated Legacies was granted the Bishop of Porto Rico to enable him to complete the second wing of the new buildings for St. Andrew's School at Mayaguez. It is expected that the Bishop will repay this sum from specials.

In Brazil arrangements were made to enable the Bishop to pay off all the indebtedness on the Southern Cross School at Porto Alegre.

Miss Katharine P. Gass, step-daughter of the Bishop of Mississippi, was appointed as missionary teacher in the Cathedral School at Havana, Cuba.

The retirement of Miss E. H. McCullough, who has been a worker at Mayaguez, Porto Rico, since June, 1908, was accepted, and a suitable pension provided from the United Offering of the Woman's Auxiliary.

In the foreign field an offer of the China Medical Board of $17,625 for the equipment and improvement of St. James' Hospital, Anking, was accepted with much appreciation. The China Medical Board also assured the Board of its readiness to appropriate $4,200 a year for five years for the salary of a physician, a stenographer, and toward the maintenance of the hospital. Dr. Harry B. Taylor was authorized to appeal for $10,000 to add to the amount granted by the China Medical Board to secure the necessary equipment for the hospital.

The Rev. T. M. Tong, one of the ablest of the younger clergy in the District of Shanghai, who has been in this country taking post-graduate work at the Philadelphia Divinity School to better equip himself for teaching in the theological department of St. John's University, expressed his desire, approved by Bishop Graves and urged by Dean Bartlett, to remain in this country another year. Permission was given and arrangement made to secure the services of Mr. Tong as speaker on behalf of the Board during the present summer.

The Bishop of Shanghai was authorized to sell certain property which is not now needed in Shanghai and to use the funds to establish permanently All Saints' Parish in that city.

Theological Seminary in Virginia.

At the recent meeting of the Trustees of the Virginia Theological Seminary and High School several matters of interest were considered.

The Board, learning that few students now choose Hebrew in their course of studies, decided to urge upon those "who by reason of their scholastic attainments could profit by it," to apply themselves to this study.

Bishop Brown was asked to confer with the Dean of the Seminary and the principal of the High School as to the best method of adapting the services at the Seminary Chapel so as to minister most effectually to the needs of the students at both institutions, pending the erection of a chapel at the Episcopal High School.

Initial steps were taken towards the establishment of a fund out of the earnings at the Episcopal High School for the increase of scholarship privileges at that school.

Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin was advised to delay for the present the publication of his work on the history of the Seminary.

Summer Training School for Workers, Sewanee, Tenn.

The Summer Training School for Workers will hold its annual session at Sewanee, Tenn., August 6 to 13, inclusive. Instruction will be given in Missions, in Social Service and in Christian Education, and there will be also a course of instruction in the Church and Country Life. In addition to these periods of instruction, there will be discussion at evening sessions on such subjects as "Call to Preparation," "Leadership," "Office and Mission of the Prophet," "Men's Work in the Parish," "The Church in War," "The Church and the Reconstruction."

The keynote of the instruction to be given this year will be "Leadership." There never was a time when leadership is more needed than at the present, and every effort will be made to give those who attend the opportunity to get such inspiration and to receive such information as to enable them to contribute to leadership in the work of the Church. It is to be hoped that a goodly number will gather together "on the mountain," and there, in quietude, pray, study to know the mind of Christ and to receive inspiration and power, and then return to their homes prepared to stand strong for the highest and best—to lead. Every teacher should be a leader. In view of the present requirements of the government, the railroads do not feel it expedient to make the usual special rate to Conferences and Summer Schools, but be sure to ask at the railroad station about the regular summer rate to Monteagle—Sewanee. Special arrangement has been made with the Sewanee Inn for board at the rate of $10.00 per week.

Brotherhood Men at Play.

The Coming Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The readers of the Southern Churchman have come to know well the National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and many look forward to its yearly sessions with keen anticipation. This year's gathering will be held at Northfield, in the Diocese of Western Massachusetts, near where the State lines of Vermont, Massachusetts and New Hampshire come together.

This is the heart of the great vacation land of New England, and an ideally situated place for the holding of a Church convention. The Brotherhood gathering this year, as in the past, will give an opportunity for clergy and laity to discuss together the work of the Church.

The Church has within it today many hundreds of men—yes, thousands—who received their first inspiration as leaders in the Church's work through attendance at one of the Conventions of the Brotherhood. These men have been inspired to a large and consecrated service, and today there are many older boys and men within the Church who need a like inspiration, that the Church may rise to its best in the great work God has committed to it.

Speakers will include such men as Bishop Reese, Southern Ohio; Bishop Lloyd, Rev. Dr. Floyd W. Tompkins, Rev. Dr. George Craig Stewart, Rev. Bernard I. Bell, Rev. F. H. Sill, Dr. John W. Wood, Dr. William C. Sturgis and others. Every Parish and Mission desirous of doing a better work for the extension of Christ's Kingdom should be represented at the Convention.

Sessions will be held in the mornings and evenings; the afternoons will be reserved for rest and recreation. For full information address

Dr. Macfarland Goes to France for Conference.

In response to an invitation from all the Protestant organizations in France, conveyed through the French High Commissioner, M. Andre Tardieu, Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America and Chairman of the United Committee on Christian Service for Relief in France and Belgium, has just sailed for France to confer with the French Federation of Protestant Churches and its United Committee, representing all the Protestant organizations, and to look carefully into and bring back a report concerning the conditions and needs of the French churches. During his stay in France Dr. Macfarland will be the guest of the French Government, in accordance with an invitation conveyed by the French Foreign Office through the French High Commission, in a cablegram received on the eve of his departure, reading: "Please advise Dr. Macfarland that the French Government asks him to consider himself as its guest during his stay in France."

With Our Army Chaplains.

Major (Rt. Rev.) Charles H. Brent, Senior Headquarters Chaplain of the American Expeditionary Force in France, has recently written to Dr. Robert E. Speer, Chairman of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, as follows: "I am deeply indebted to the War-Time Commission for their encouragement. We are trying to shape our office with a view to meeting the situation in the most whole-hearted way, and do everything with reference to the Kingdom of God. We have met with nothing but support from all sides. The new Chaplains who are coming in impress us as being men of the right type."

The Rev. H. C. Merrill, missionary to deaf-mutes, has recently made a trip, including Romney, Clarksburg, Buckhannon, Charleston and Huntington, W. Va., and Newport News, Norfolk and Richmond, Va. He baptized one child in St. Luke's, Norfolk, and two in Trinity Church, Huntington. Mr. Merrill also visited State Schools for the Deaf in Romney, W. Va., and Staunton, Va.

ANKING, CHINA.

Rt. Rev. D. T. Huntington, D. D., Bishop.

Death of the Rev. Dr. Jackson.

A message from China to the Board of Missions announces the death in Kiukiang of Rev. James Jackson, D. D. For more than twenty years Dr. Jackson was one of the missionaries of the English Wesleyan Church in China. In 1900 he was confirmed by Bishop Graves, and later in the same year was ordained to the diaconate and priesthood. After a year on the teaching staff of St. John's University, Shanghai, he became, in February, 1900, rector of what was then Boone School. Dr. Jackson's experience and ability as an educationalist were at once felt in the school administration. In 1903 a college department was opened. Later, theological and medical schools were organized. In 1909 Boone College was incorporated as a university, and two years later the first class was graduated with the degree of B. A.

Dr. Jackson retired from his duties as president of the university about a year ago, and has since been living in Kiukiang as a missionary, employed in the District of Anking under Bishop Huntington.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Ordination: In St. James' Church, Richmond, on Sunday morning, June 16, the Rt. Rev. Robert A. Gibson, D. D., ordained to the diaconate Mr. John Fleming Wren Feild, a member of the senior class at the Theological Seminary in Virginia. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. Francis Ribble, rector of St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. G. Freeland Peter, rector of St. James'. Before entering the Seminary Mr. Feild took a lively interest in the work of the Church, serving as a member of the local council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and was for three years president of the Junior Local Assembly. He will assume charge of St. Luke's Church, Richmond, and assist the Rev. Hugh W. Sublett, rector of St. John's Church, with special work at Weddell Memorial.

Meeting of City Missionary Society.

The adjourned meeting of the Richmond City Missionary Society, held in Grace Church Parish House on the night of June 17, was larger and more enthusiastic than the meeting last month. Every church in the city was well represented by members of its congregation. The reports of the committees showed splendid progress being made. Mrs. C. R. Kuyk, chairman of the Hospital Committee, reported an excellent plan whereby, through the co-operation of the Daughters of the King, all the hospitals will be visited regularly and systematically and cases reported to the City Missionary and to the Society. The City Missionary was authorized to organize and conduct open air park services throughout the summer. Steps were taken for the procuring of papers prepared in proper form, in accordance with instructions from the Governor's office, for submitting petitions for pardons for convicts who have served over half their terms with good prison records. About twenty persons volunteered their services to assist in the correspondence necessary to carrying on this branch of the work. The meeting adjourned subject to call.

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop

Chapel Dedicated at Camp Meade.

Epiphany Chapel and the Clergy House at Camp Meade, were dedicated on June 3 by Bishop Murray, assisted by Bishop Garland, of Pennsylvania. A large number of clergymen were present from the Dioceses of Pennsylvania, Maryland and Washington, and addresses were made by Bishop Murray and Brigadier-General Nicholson. Among those attending the service were the daughter of General Meade, for whom the cantonment is named, and his nephew, Major Meade, commander of the Remount Depot, which forms a part of Camp Meade. In addition to the chapel, which is the gift of two women, members of the Church of the Epiphany, Washington, there is a large dormitory, in which fifty men can be accommodated. The Communion silver will be provided by the Daughters of the American Revolution. There is a staff of four Clergy representing the three Dioceses by which the work is sustained—the Rev. Messrs. James M. Magruder and S. Tagart Steele, of Maryland; Stanley R. West, of Pennsylvania, and William C. White, of Washington, living together and working under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. James A. Montgomery, of Philadelphia.

Maryland Clericus: At the regular monthly meeting of the Maryland Clericus held in the Parish House of St. John's Church, Waverly, the Rev. William D. Morgan, D. D., rector, on June 10, an interesting address on "The Power of Ideals in National Life" was read by Mr. Samuel M. Hann, Vice-President of the Fidelity Trust Company, of Baltimore. After an informal discussion of the paper and a vote of thanks to the essayist, the clergy present and their guests were delightfully entertained at luncheon by the ladies of the parish.

The Quarterly Meeting of the Archdeaconry of Towson was held on Wednesday, June 12, at St. John's Church, Kingsville, the Rev. Frederick Shears, rector. About thirty clergymen and an equal number of lay delegates were present. The meeting was addressed by the Rev. Romilly F. Humphries, D. D., rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, Baltimore, his subject being "The New Junior Plan." After the address a large number of the clergy volunteered to adopt the plan in their parishes in the autumn. A bountiful luncheon was served on the church lawn. In conjunction with the meeting a class of six, presented by the rector, was confirmed by Bishop Murray.

The Archdeaconry of Baltimore held its quarterly meeting on the evening of June 13 in the Parish House of Christ Church, Baltimore, the Rev. Edwin B. Niver, D. D., rector. After the meeting was opened by the Rev. Peregrine Wroth, D. D., Archdeacon, encouraging reports were read by the rectors of parishes partly supported by the missionary funds of the Diocese. The Bishop spoke of the satisfactory completion of the Chapel and Clergy House at Odenton, adjoining Camp Meade, and of the splendid interdenominational co-operative work already being carried on there. He especially urged the immediate paying in full of the recent assessment on the individual congregations for the support of this important work. The Rev. Dr. Humphries spoke also on the "New Junior Plan" and explained in detail its application to the work of a city parish.

The Rev. Clarence Stuart McClellan, Jr., first assistant rector of Christ Church, Baltimore, has tendered his resignation, to take effect September 1. He expects to take up independent work of an important character elsewhere.

Mr. McClellan began his work in Christ Church last September, and on account of the rector, the Rev. Dr. Edwin B. Niver, being stationed at Quantico, Va., as Chaplain of the United States Marine Corps, was given an unusual responsibility. He has come into great local prominence through his efforts to make pleasant the Sunday leaves of absence of soldiers, sailors and marines who have been in the city. Hundreds of men in uniform from the different camps and stations have attended his Sunday afternoon military services and have been entertained at dinner by the women of the church in the parish house. Mr. McClellan's leadership in this and other activities has won for him the enthusiastic co-operation of the entire congregation.

St. Bartholomew's Sunday-school Gives to the Red Cross: Trinity Sunday at St. Bartholomew's Sunday-school, Pittsboro, was devoted to the cause of the second war fund for the Red Cross. Special exercises were held and an offering taken for this fund, which amounted to $53.00. This is especially commendable when the entire Sunday-school, including officers and teachers numbers only twenty.

The Porter Military Academy.

The fifty-first annual commencement of the Porter Military Academy was held in St. Timothy's Chapel, Charleston, S. C., on June 4, and was largely attended by the parents of the cadets and friends of the Academy.

The closing exercises began on Friday night, May 31, and consisted of most interesting contests for the declamation medal and the essay cup awarded to the successful literary society.

On Saturday afternoon field sports were engaged in, which manifested excellent training and remarkable athletic feats. So proficient have the cadets become that they won the silver cup in Columbia, S. C., at the Interstate athletic contest. That night the class exercises, which displayed much preparation and natural talent, afforded much pleasure and interest to the large audience assembled.

On Sunday, June 2, in the Church of the Holy Communion, the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop of Atlanta, delivered the baccalaureate sermon. Bishop Mikell had been formerly rector of the church and also of the Academy. His address to the cadets was strong and impressive and most helpful to the large congregation present.

The competitive drill and magnificent dress parade took place Monday afternoon. The cadets not only did themselves credit, but reflected upon the excellent training under Major George C. Martin, who has been assigned to the Academy by the United States Government. Much interest was manifested by the large crowd present when the beautiful flag was presented by the sponsor to "Company B," the prize company.

On commencement day, the address to the graduating class was delivered by the Hon. Joseph W. Barnwell, a most distinguished member of the Charleston bar and public-spirited citizen of South Carolina. Medals were awarded for excelling in drilling, choir work, mathematics and different studies. An incident which was touching and most effective was the awarding of a silver cup "to that senior classman who has set the best example to the school and who has stood for the highest things." This cup was presented to the Academy by Dr. William H. Frampton in loving memory of his brother, Joseph Maybank Frampton, who gave his life for his country in the present cruel strife. Bishop Guerry awarded the cup to Lieutenant W. A. Clark, and paid a loving tribute to the beautiful life of Private Frampton, a graduate of the Academy. He then dedicated a handsome service flag. There are about one hundred and seventy-five boys from this Academy who are now enlisted in the war. Two gold stars represent Joseph M. Frampton and James Hemphill, who have died for their country. The Rev. Walter Mitchell, D. D., who has just completed his tenth year as rector of the Academy, presented, after an affectionate and striking address, the diplomas and certificates to the graduates. The salutatory was delivered by Captain John Porter, grandson of the founder of the Academy, and the valedictory by Lieutenant W. A. Clark. A number of the Clergy were in vestments, and the service was led by a large chorister of cadets. The service closed with the national hymn.

Thus ended one of the most interesting and successful commencements in the history of the Academy. The total enrollment of the school this year was two hundred and forty-three. The Academy this year has representation from twenty-five States, including some from the far Northwestern States, besides four foreign countries. Five cadets represented Cuba, one from Costa Rica, one from Mexico and one from the Canal Zone. This shows the national reputation of the Academy. A new feature this year in the Academy is the wearing of the uniform and compulsory drilling by the day pupils.

The Trustees met after the commencement exercises and received a most excellent and gratifying report from the rector, showing the school to be in splendid condition. The Trustees voted that many necessary improvements be made in the dormitories this summer.

On Tuesday night a very enthusiastic Alumni meeting was held, and the members of the Association most heartily endorsed and promised their earnest co-operation to the Trustees in their efforts this fall to raise an endowment fund of one hundred thousand dollars.

To show the remarkable growth of this Academy, in 1908-09 there were ninety-seven pupils, in 1917-18 the number had increased to two hundred and forty-three. Praise is due to the rector for his indefatigable labors and splendid achievements during his ten years' administration.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. Robert S. Coupland, D. D., rector of Trinity Church, New Orleans, according to advices received on June 8, has arrived safely "somewhere in France," to take up his work with the Red Cross immediately in the rear of the firing line.

The Rev. James M. Owens, rector of St. Mark's Church, Shreveport, has been granted a year's leave of absence by his vestry, and is in charge of the Red Cross office in New Orleans.

The Rev. S. L. Vail, rector of Mt. Olivet Church, Algiers, New Orleans, is holding services at the naval station at Algiers.

Services arranged for by the Episcopal churches of New Orleans are being held on the third Sunday of each month at Camp Nicholls, Jackson Barracks, and the naval station at West End, all located in New Orleans.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

At the United Offering Service of the Woman's Auxiliary in Trinity Cathedral, Newark, the sermon was preached by the Rev. Luke M. White, of Montclair, the offerings presented amounting to $4,566.00, making, with last year's offering, $8,898.00 for the two years of the present triennium, indicating a good increase from the same period in the last triennium and a larger united offering than ever at the next General Convention.

Clerical Changes: The Rev. Alfred Q. Plank has become curate at Grace Church, Newark; the Rev. Roy J. Riblet, of Oberlin, Ohio, has accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, Harrison, to begin his work September 1; the Rev. Louis W. Pitt, of the graduating class at Berkeley Divinity School, takes charge of Christ Church, Newark, July 1; the Rev. James D. Kennedy, of Long Island, has taken charge of the Church of the Epiphany, Allendale; the Rev. Barrett P. Tyler and the Rev. Burnham N. Dell have been ordered to the Chaplains' Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville, Ky.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop

The Schuylkill County Clericus held a meeting at Mahanoy City on Monday, June 10, and the members were the guests of the Rev. O. P. Steckel at luncheon. After several years of practically uninterrupted service as rector of the Church of Faith, the Rev. Mr. Steckel has received two months' leave of absence from his parish, and will tour the Middle West, journeying as far as Colorado.

The Annual Summer School of the Diocese of Bethlehem will open on Monday, June 24, at Bishopthorpe Manor, South Bethlehem. Coincident with the Summer School will be a gathering of the Clergy of the Diocese, who will be the Bishop's guests. The Bishop will hold several conferences with his Clergy.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

Knoxville: On Sunday, June 9, Bishop Darlington visited for the first time the new mission of the Holy Spirit and formally opened the three rooms which have been obtained and fitted for the purpose of worship. These rooms are in the central part of the town, well located for the purpose. On this occasion the place was crowded, and four were confirmed. The choir and part of the congregation of St. John's, Westfield, were in attendance and assisted in the service. This work is in charge of the Rev. Guy F. Caruthers, D. D., rector of St. John's, Westfield. The name "Holy Spirit" was chosen because it was the name invoked by William Penn in founding the State of Pennsylvania.

War Measures Adopted by the Philadelphia Divinity School.

When once the war is over, and even to some small degree perhaps before, our seminaries will probably receive many applications for admission from young men who have been in the national service. A double provision must be made for these men. First, the course of study preparatory for the ministry may require adaptation to their special needs. Second, if their numbers are considerable, the scholarship funds available will have to be supplemented.

The Divinity School in Philadelphia desires to make it publicly known that it will meet either or both of these problems, as they arise; and that it is already preparing itself to do so.

The following preamble and resolutions bearing upon this matter were prepared by the faculty and adopted at the annual meeting of the Joint Boards:

Whereas, the Joint Boards recognize the great opportunity that will be before the Church to recruit its ministry, when our young men return from national service, and are anxious that this school shall do its part in providing adequate financial aid and suitable training for these men; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Joint Boards authorize the faculty to make public announcement, first, that the curriculum of the school will be, so far as necessary, modified and shaped to meet the special needs of such students; and, second, that the Board will see to it that no promising young man who has been in war service need be deterred, by lack of means, from enrolling as a student in this school; and be it further

Resolved, That a committee of two be appointed, who, together with the Dean, shall prepare and issue to Church people, particularly in this Diocese and State, an appeal for gifts and pledges for a War Scholarship Fund, to be used for the financial aid of young men who, having served their country in the war, shall afterwards desire to study for the ministry.

A special course for older men is also being provided for.

Trinity Parish News.

As one part of its War Service, and in response to the call of our Government for measures of economy, Trinity Parish has carefully revised its budget and reduced expenditures where this was possible without lasting injury to the work. Many things valuable and useful, but not wholly indispensable, have been given up for the period of the war. The clerical staff has been reduced to set free more of the clergy for direct war service. In several of the chapels there will for the present be only one curate instead of two, as heretofore.

After thirty years of most faithful and effective service, the Rev. Dr. Geer has, at his own request, been retired, and will give up his work as Vicar of St. Paul's Chapel on October 1st. Dr. Geer has been granted a pension and will have the title of Vicar Emeritus.

Some of the features introduced by Dr. Geer have been the lunch club for women, which has used the parish building and been far more than a lunch club, in that it has been a social centre and a missionary society. Then the great musical and patriotic services have attracted thousands and profoundly affected thousands more. The double noon day service, at 12 o'clock and at 1 o'clock, is another unique feature. Dr. Geer is a graduate of Columbia University and the General Seminary. He is intensely loyal and active in this war, and made a record recently in work for the Red Cross in which the chapel had a part.

The Rev. Dr. McComas has been elected Vicar of St. Paul's Chapel and will enter upon his duties when Dr. Geer retires. In addition to his new duties as Vicar of St. Paul's, Dr. McComas will continue to fill the post of Senior Curate at Trinity Church.

The Rev. John Brian McCormick, a son of Bishop McCormick, Curate at the Chapel of the Intercession, has received a commission as Chaplain in the Army, and has sailed for France.

The rector of the parish is continuing his work as Chaplain at Camp Upton.

There are now 571 stars on the Trinity Parish Service Flag.

The Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses held its annual council at St. Stephen's Church last week, about 150 nurses being present out of the 2,000 who are members of the Guild throughout the country. Appeal was made for nurses to go to the Red Cross, and a splendid record was read of those already gone. Bishop Birch was re-elected Chaplain General.

ALASKA.

Rt. Rev. P. T. Rowe, D. D., Bishop.

News Notes of Interest.

The Council of Advice consists of the following: The Very Rev. G. D. Christian, Juneau; Canon A. E. Butcher, Douglas; Messrs. J. H. Cobb and D. D. Evans, Juneau.

The Finance Committee of the Jurisdiction consists of the Very Rev. G. D. Christian, Juneau; Mr. J. H. Cobb, Juneau; Mr. B. D. Stewart, Sulzer.

The Council of Advice has recommended to the Bishop as candidate for Holy Orders Mr. Richard Ceredig Jenkins, now in charge at Ketchikan, recently received from the Congregational ministry, in Seattle, Wash.

Dean Christian, of Juneau, gives one of the courses of lectures at the Summer Theological School at Portland the latter part of June. The subject will be, "The Belief and the Book."

Mr. Christian recently celebrated the tenth anniversary of his ordination to the diaconate in St. John's Church, Richmond, Va.

Canon Butcher, Custodian of the War Commission Fund, received over $200 for that purpose from the Alaska Missions.

Personal Notes

The Rev. W. D. Buckner, rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, Tenn., has been appointed Chaplain of Base Hospital Unit No. 57, which is awaiting orders for overseas service. Mr. Buckner has not yet made his decision known.

The address of the Rev. W. Roy Mason is changed from Mission Home, Va., to Charlottesville, Va. Mr. Mason has taken charge of Christ Church, in succession to the Rev. H. B. Lee, D. D.

The address of the Rev. W. L. Kinsolving is changed from care of St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga, to care of Mrs. J. D. Eager, Lookout Mountain, Chattanooga, Tenn.

At the late commencement of the University of Pittsburgh, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was bestowed upon the Rev. Edward Schofield Travers, rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, Pa.

The Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Rochester, N. Y., and Miss Ethel Howard, daughter of Mr. John C. Howard, of Ashland, Va., were married on Saturday, June 8, in St. James' Church, Ashland, the Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D. D., rector of the church, officiating, assisted by the Rt. Rev. W. Cabell Brown, D. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Virginia.

At the commencement of Grove City College, Pa., on June 12, the degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred upon the Ven. Reginald S. Radcliffe, Archdeacon of Ridgeway, Diocese of Erie, and rector of Grace Church, Ridgeway.

The Rev. G. P. T. Sargent, rector of Grace Church, Grand Rapids, Mich., will be at Camp Logan as Camp Chaplain, representing the War Commission of the Diocese of Chicago, and under appointment by the Senior Chaplain of the Naval District. He will be there throughout the summer months.

The Rev. H. A. Willey has taken charge as locum tenens at St. Philip's Cathedral, Atlanta, Ga., during the absence of the Dean in France.

The Rev. Edward Pinkney Wroth has entered upon his work as rector of Holy Trinity Church, Baltimore, Md.

The Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, Professor of Biblical Literature and Chaplain at Sweet Briar College, has been given a trip by the student body to the Y. M. C. A. Conference at Blue Ridge, N. C., as an expression of their esteem and appreciation of his work in the college.

Summer Addresses.

The Rt. Rev. Daniel S. Tuttle, D. D., Wequetonsing, Mich.

The Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., North East Harbor, Me.

The Rev. Thomas K. Nelson, from Virginia Episcopal School, Reusens, Va., to University, Va.

Until September 1 the Rev. W. N. Claybrook will have charge of St. Luke's Church, Hot Springs, Va.

Ordinations.

On Sunday, June 9, in St. Matthew's Church, Kenedy, Tex., the Bishop of West Texas ordained to the diaconate Mr. Paul Delafield Bowden, B. S.

Morning Prayer and the Litany were said by Chaplain Frank A. Rhea. The Rt. Rev. Jas. S. Johnston, D. D., was the celebrant. The candidate was presented by his father, the Rev. Upton B. Bowden, who also preached the sermon.

Mr. Bowden will work during the summer under Dr. Stevens, rector of St. Marks' Church, San Antonio, in the Red Cross service at Fort Sam Houston, and will complete his course at the Virginia Theological Seminary next year.

On Sunday, June 2, in St. Peter's Church, Morristown, N. J., Edwin S. Ford was ordained deacon by Bishop Stearly, being presented for ordination by the rector, the Rev. Dr. D. M. Brookman. Mr. Ford is a graduate of Princeton and a member of the Senior Class at Cambridge Divinity School.

On Thursday, June 13, at St. Luke's Church, Lebanon, Pa., the Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, Bishop of Bethlehem, ordained to the diaconate Clarence R. Wagner, of Lebanon. The Rev. J. P. Briggs took the early celebration, and the Rev. John Mitchel Page read Morning Prayer at 10 o'clock. Dr. Page preached the sermon at 10:30, and presented the candidate. The Rev. A. A. V. Binnington, rector of the parish, read the Epistle, and the candidate read the Gospel. The Litany was read by the Rev. Le Roy Eltringham. The Rev. Mr. Wagner will have charge of the Church of Faith, Mahanoy City, during July, and in August he will go to Manila, where he will be connected with the Cathedral.

In the Church of the Holy Trinity, Middletown, Conn., on Wednesday, June 5, five members of the graduating class of Berkeley Divinity School were ordained to the diaconate. They were Messrs. David R. Johns, Ansonia, presented by the Rev. Erit B. Schmitt; Harold J. Edwards, Bridgeport, presented by the Rev. Stephen Sherman and the Rev. Franklin H. Miller; Raymond L. Schofield, New Haven, presented by the Rev. Charles O. Scoville; Louis W. Pitt, Middletown, presented by the Rev. F. F. German, D. D.; and Harold S. Olafson, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, presented by the Rev. Samuel R. Colladay. The Litany was read by the Rev. R. C. Ormsbee; Bishop Rhinelander was the preacher. Bishop Brewster, Bishop Acheson, Bishop Lines, Bishop Olmsted (Continued on page 24.)

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

Suggestive: Rev. W. H. Jefferys, Superintendent of City Missions of Philadelphia, in his annual report in urging co-operation in his work of the West Philadelphia Divinity School, says:

"In medicine the day of study by lecture is dead and gone. Some day the Divinity School also will clothe its dry bones with flesh and blood."

In this connection it was interesting and encouraging to hear Canon DeVries, of Washington Cathedral, and member of the Board of Religious Education make the statement that there was a strong move on foot to drop Hebrew as a compulsory study at our Seminaries and to substitute Applied Psychology and Sociology in its place.

Would it not be well for our divinity students to do a certain amount of actual work with some City Missionary Society, or large institutional church, as a regular part of their preparation for Holy Orders, just as medical students have a period of hospital service?

The Enemy Within.

Since the first concentration of our man power two very striking and very terrible things have happened.

Two of our large and prominent cities have had to be "cleaned up" by United States authority, for the protection of the young men encamped near them.

In each case—in Philadelphia and in Richmond, Va.—the police and the municipal authorities were blamed and criticized very harshly.

Should our criticism stop there?

There is a power behind the policeman. That easy-going, good natured official usually does just about what he thinks the people around him would like him to do.

The real power behind the policemen is not the municipal authority, but public sentiment.

The reason that the Federal authorities had to go in and do what was necessary to make those two cities safe for our young soldiers and sailors was, not so much because the police would not co-operate in the stopping of the illegal sale of liquor and in running down prostitution as it was that there was not enough decent feeling and desire for clean conditions among the citizens of those two cities to make the police and other officials feel that they would have the hearty and enthusiastic support of a large majority of the citizens whom they were serving if they became more watchful, and really set themselves to "clean up."

Now, this brings us to something else.

Who and what is it that creates, or should create, public desire for decency and a high moral standard?

It should be the ministers and the churches, but is it?

If it is, then the fact that an outside authority had to come to do that which should have been done from within is extremely, yes, disgracefully, discreditable to the influence which our clergymen and churches wield.

And, if in defense, one says, "But they do not mould public sentiment," then why don't they?

In one of these cities the Secretary of the State Board of Charities and Corrections had come before the Ministerial Union and pled with that body to arouse the people of their churches to the danger of the enemy within.

What has been the response? How many sermons have been preached upon this subject?

"Ah," somebody says, "but venereal disease and prostitution are not fit subjects for sermons."

Are they not? Listen to the ringing words of Bishop Lawrence in an address in Cambridge:

"It is time that the lid be off and men and women meet this problem as they have met diphtheria and tuberculosis.

"People are talking. You are talking. I am talking. Our boys and girls are talking. Why not come out into the open and let the talk be healthy, sane, medical and practical?"

With such a leader of church thought and action as the Bishop of Massachusetts calling us forward, are we going to hang back and let the enemy within do us more harm physically, and vastly more harm spiritually and morally, than the enemy at the front?

The Facts, as recently stated by officials who should know, are that over 400,000 of the fighting men of Canada have been infected with venereal disease. Nearly one thousand men, if not more, are interned in the isolated hospital for such cases at Camp Lee now.

General Pershing has stated that more infected men have arrived from Newport News than from any other United States port.

These are ominous figures, and are far from creditable to the section of the country from which these soldiers come, because many of them are infected before they reach camp and the reflection is not so much upon camp life as it is upon civil life.

The Remedy for the conditions existing to-day in our cantonments and in the armies of Canada should be found further back than in the great cities adjoining the camps.

There must be a vigorous co-operation of the churches with the health officers.

In the country and smaller towns the churches are the principal places for disseminating information, and through them the new health regulations can be made known.

But more particularly and emphatically the Church is the place to build up the spiritual powers of resistance of our young men.

Venereal disease is not like typhoid fever or measles, to which one can be exposed without knowing it.

There is a lot of undue sentimentality about "our soldier boys."

The "soldier boy" who is suffering from this plague has not been overtaken in the camp by it. He has deliberately gone out to gratify an animal instinct, which he might have resisted and conquered, and he has suffered from a moral and spiritual weakness which precedes the physical disease.

It is an encouraging sign of the times that men suffering from this loathsome disease are segregated in camps and treated as much like prisoners as they are like patients. This fact should be given the widest publicity "back home," and will do a great deal toward keeping young men straight and clean.

Above all, however, the minister is the doctor of the soul, and the administrator of moral tonics. Now is the time to do so above all others, both in sermons and private talks with men.

The Church and Church leaders should come forward boldly to take its share in rooting out this dreadful thing that has been found to be so prevalent in our midst.

Convincing: It is a favorite argument of those favoring legal liquor selling that the saloon means "more drinking but less drunkenness."

The following, clipped from a Boston paper, disposes of this theory in brief and convincing manner:

One of the best and most conclusive tests recorded of the sobering effect of closing saloons was that made in Boston, last winter, in connection with the conservation of fuel. The saloons were ordered to be closed on five Mondays, so that coal which would otherwise be used in heating them might be devoted to a better purpose. At any rate it is worth repeating now:

Arrests for drunkenness in Boston:
Monday, Jan. 7, saloons open....154
Monday, Jan. 14, saloons open....129
Monday, Jan. 21, saloons closed... 50
Monday, Jan. 28, saloons closed... 18
Monday, Feb. 4, saloons closed.... 7
Monday, Feb. 11, saloons closed... 10
Monday, Feb. 18, saloons closed... 18
Monday, Feb. 25, saloons open....125
Monday, March 4, saloons open...141

A glance at these figures shows that the arrests for drunkenness for the entire five dry Mondays were fewer than on any one of the preceeding or succeeding wet Mondays.

Luke 16

Fourth Sunday After Trinity: We have now completed, in the morning Old Testament Historico-topical course, the return and establishment of the Jews in their own land, together with many reforms instituted by Ezra and Nehemiah. For several weeks the morning lessons, both Sundays and week days, will consist of the Old Testament Law. What we know as Judaism as a development from the return to the Coming of the Christ, a development due to the attempt to enforce the law as given in the Pentateuch. The Sunday morning lessons for some time are from Deuteronomy, a most readable book, differing from all other Old Testament books as combining the legal and the prophetic points of view; historically suiting the period we are now studying and topically fitting the appeals for obedience which belongs to the last half of the Church year.

The selection for this morning is an appeal for obedience based, first, on the experience of redemption which had been theirs, a part of their unique position among the nations of the world; and based secondly on the blessings which should come to them and their children. This is addressed to a nation, which (though knowing it not) was on its way to becoming a Church; while the second lesson is the corresponding appeal to the Christian Church itself, the "called" and the Family of God.

There is much in these lessons that goes with the themes of providence and regeneration in Collect and Epistle, and the two together are timely for us now with their double messages to nation and Church. Another theme (Epistle) is creation, with which regeneration is closely connected; and these two themes determined the selection of first and second evening lessons: God's appeal to Job in the presence of the mysteries of nature; and the Christ's instruction of Nicodemus on being born anew. The former recalls Bishop Butler on the unwisdom of criticising a system so vast of which we know so little. At the same time, St. Paul (in Epistle) brings out, in a very different manner from the once famous Bridgewater treatises, that nature is full of sufferings, which may be the means to us of being born anew; while the sons of God, on their part, may be the redemption of nature. This is a great advance on the negative position of Job. The latter part of second lesson carries the truth of regeneration into eternal life, here and hereafter; and this shows how alone the prayer of the Collect may be answered, passing through things temporal so as to fail not of the things eternal.

On week days the Old Testament Law of the morning is paralleled by the Spirit at work in the New Covenant; and in the evening the Old Testament wisdom of Proverbs is paralleled by the Life of Him who was the Wisdom of God; the only life that ever properly balanced things temporal and things eternal, giving to each its due. Various themes will be found suitable to the Sunday.

Next Sunday the Deuteronomic theme of obedience is continued, while the second lesson brings out the failure of the ancient Church to attain to a realization of the covenant position and the power of the New. The first evening lesson illustrates the collect, the second lesson being based on Numbers 23:10(b).

Collect For Fourth Sunday After Trinity.

O God, the protector of all that trust in Thee, without whom nothing is strong; nothing is holy; Increase and multiply upon us Thy mercy; that, Thou being our ruler and guide, we may so pass through things temporal, that we finally lose not the things eternal. Grant this, O Heavenly Father, for Jesus Christ's sake, our Lord. Amen.

Collect For St. John Baptist's Day.

Almighty God, by Whose providence Thy servant, John Baptist, was wonderfully born, and sent to prepare the way of Thy Son, our Saviour, by preaching repentance; Make us so to follow his doctrine and holy life, that we may truly repent according to his preaching; and after his example constantly speak the truth, boldly rebuke vice, and patiently suffer for the truth's sake; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

in a few days? Matt. 27:20; Luke 23:23.

7. How does Jesus end this first day of His last week? Mark 11:11.

8. Give prophecies of Christ's Royal Nature. Psalm 2:6; 89:18; Isa. 32:22; Jere. 46:18; Zech. 9:9; 14:9; 1 Tim. 6:15.

9. Do you personally recognize this King's rule? Rom. 12:1.

Note: Judas' disappointment and hatred are in great contrast to Mary's generous love. Our Lord publicly asserted His Royal nature and office, and it was acknowledged. But an unthinking crowd could be easily swayed by alert leaders.

Above Measure.

The best things in life have to be given freely, not from a sense of duty. You never can measure out friendship; you never can tell how much a man ought to do for his country; you never can tell what he should do for God. There is always that overflow, that abundance, which is chiefly valuable for us and is valuable to God as it comes as the free will offering of our hearts. You say of a certain person that he is just, implying that you don't quite like him. We may strive with our Maker in two ways: We may say to him, "What makest thou?" or we may say, "He hath no hands." We may quarrel with God. You say of another person that he is generous, meaning that you do like him. It is because of that which he does beyond what he is obliged to do. If there is any life where this applies with the utmost force, it is to the religious life. Your piety must make the cup overflow. If you do exactly your duty and nothing else, your life is no comfort to you and little help to any one else. You want something of joyousness and freedom in it, and then it tells.—Alexander McKenzie.

For the Southern Churchman. The Little Chair in the Grown-up House.

Virginia G. Stanard.

The little chair in the grown-up house,
Sits quiet and alone,
Brown and still as a little mouse,
In a corner of its own.
The big chairs tilt and swing and sway
With grown folks, to and fro,
But the little chair is silent there
While long years come and go.

The morning sunshine gilds it gold,
The evening turns it gray,
The fire light on the floor at night
Colors it red and gay;
But burdenless from dawn to dark,
It waits with arms held wide—
Babyish, small, against the wall
Empty and set aside.

Yet, when the moon is silver-clear
Upon the midnight gloom,
Sometimes I hear—or think I hear—
A wee stir in the room—
A rocking, rocking, gentle, low,
As soft as soft can be,
Backward and forward, sweet and slow,
And see—or think I see—

In the corner by the chimney-place,
Bright moonlight on her hair,
Dear and content, a little child
Deep in the little chair.
And so I smile and sleep again,
To wake serene and strong;
And afterward the grown-up house
Is happy all day long!

The Text.

N. B. T.

"I am going to steer clear of this situation Sunday, just as I have done all along," the Rev. Marcus Gail declared. "It is hard to disappoint the fixed expectation of the whole congregation, but I still contend that the trouble must be settled outside the church doors."

His wife looked up from the clerical vest that she was sponging, then went on with her work. "What text will you choose?" she said.

The minister moved restlessly. "I don't know, yet," he answered. "I have spent the whole morning over the concordance, trying to find a suitable one. The task ought to be easy enough, but somehow it is not."

Mrs. Gail's lashes flickered above her clear eyes as she bent over the vest. She had had no doubts from the first as to the difficulty of the task.

"I must be utterly impersonal," Mr. Gail went on, "and I must, of course, avoid all reference to doctrine." He groaned. Doctrine was the crux of the whole matter. That is, it was the starting point. The quarrel had ranged so far from its beginning that some of the dissenters had altogether forgotten what they were quarrelling about. But a point of doctrine had set them off, as a few recalled. The trouble had had its rise quite outside of the church—in the village literary club, to be exact. The book of fiction chosen for discussion at the April meeting touched incidentally on a point of doctrine, whereupon several of the club members entered into friendly discussion of the subject. The argument waxed a little warm, as arguments will, and before the meeting broke up most of those present were involved, one way or another. At the May meeting the controversy began afresh. Finally, a little bitter, personal note crept in that soon put the original question far into the background and substituted trivial personal bickering. Mrs. John Knight thought that Mrs. Henry Crenshaw was unnecessarily rude; Miss Elmira Yates considered that Dr. Fanshaw had forgotten himself when he responded to one of her most telling arguments. Dr. Fanshaw was convinced that Mr. Mears was merely taking this occasion to pay off an old private score. The two Betts sisters said openly that at the May meeting, when they took the floor together in what they called a spirit of most friendly contention with the Moore sisters, several members had been heard to make uncomplimentary side remarks. "Sides" were taken, factions crystallized, and by midsummer the parish was in a disheveled state.

"It's become positively purile," Mr. Gail said, at length. "I believe the town is bewitched." But he refused steadily to commit himself as to the rights and wrongs of the point in question, even though the squabblers, as long as they could keep in mind what the point had been, urged that the pastoral opinion would settle the whole matter. "You don't any of you care a pin about the point," he declared. "You are just plain fussing, and you want me to take sides. I won't do it." His decision was not shaken when the absurd disagreement passed on into the church and affected the vestry and the Ladies' Aid. "I'm going away on my vacation," he announced, in July. "When I come back, if they haven't returned to their senses I'll—I'll settle 'em."

He had no sooner made the threat and boarded the train than it was rumored that on his return he would take a stand one way or the other. The whole parish held its breath against the hour of his coming back. But when he came, and Mrs. Gail told him what his flock was counting on, he was still stubborn. "I shall preach on the faithfulness of Abraham," he said.

On Sunday morning the church was packed to the doors. Out of the corner of her observant eye the minister's wife could see the look of complacent expectancy on the composite face of the congregation; her ear gathered subdued, rustling whispers. Mr. Gail read the service calmly. He moved into the pulpit with a firm tread, and his voice was even as he gave out his text. It was a ringing sermon. The greatness of the patriarch, his trials, his faith, his rewards were tellingly set forth. Mrs. Gail felt, as she knelt for the benediction, that her husband had done more than well. Surely, now, the attention of the people had been successfully diverted from the troublesome topic. Mr. Gail retired serenely to the vestry room.

At the door of the church Mrs. Knight waylaid the pastor. Her mobile face was alight. "I want to thank you," she said in a whisper. "It was an arrow delicately winged, but undoubtedly it went to the mark." She caught sight of Mrs. Crenshaw coming down the aisle and finished with a hasty nod.

"Delicately winged!" snorted Mr. Gail, in the privacy of the home dining-room. "Now, what in time did she mean? And went to what mark?"

Mrs. Gail smiled, but she said nothing. The minister had an afternoon service at the further end of the parish, and it was best for him to keep cool for the long ride. She did not even say anything when she found him buried in the concordance again.

The next Sunday he preached an excellent sermon on giving to missions. That night Dr. Fanshaw dropped in. His manner, always cordial, had taken on added degree of warmth. "Mr. Gail," he said, as he rose to go, "I want to thank you for that sermon. You did what not one man in a hundred can ever do: you dug up a root of bitterness with such deftness of touch that the soil around it was hardly disturbed." His eyes narrowed significantly. "But from now on," he said, "the whole tree will take on fresh growth."

As the doctor's worthy back retreated into the dark, the clergyman turned helplessly to his wife. "Root of bitterness," he said slowly. "Root of bitterness, and money for the Chinese. I believe my wits are failing. What do you think?"

His helpmeet soothed him. "Talk to the children next Sunday," she said. "It's time for a Sunday-school sermon, anyhow; dear knows, they need a lecture about the way they prepare their lessons."

After the children's sermon, the Misses Betts waylaid a hurrying homeward pair. "Mr. Gail," Honora Betts said, falling in step with her pastor, while Emily Betts walked with his wife, "in all your pastorate here that was your best effort. Emily and I agree as to that. Without harshness and without undue sternness you have made people see the sin of backbiting. My sister and I feel ourselves vindicated, at last, in this unfortunate matter."

Mr. Gail laid his hat down carefully, when they reached home. "Next time," he said, "I am going to give them all what they want. I am going to take that question of doctrine over which they first fell out, put it before them in its true light—which, by the way, is a light that so far they haven't caught a glimmer of." He shut the door with a slight bang.

He was positively eloquent on that fourth Sunday in August. Carefully, clearly and with unimpeachable logic he set forth the disputed doctrine. Mrs. Gail's heart lifted as she listened. "I am glad, after all," she told herself, "that he decided to give in. It's like a major operation on the whole congregation, but at least they'll come out well men and women." Her appreciative face gave the orator fresh courage as he approached his convincing climax. The audience listened with flattering intentness.

It was with some misgivings, however, that the two joined the congregation at the door. Their consciences felt quiet and clear, but their parochial instincts were uneasy. The first group at the door opened to receive them. Miss Elmira Yates turned impulsively and laid both hands on the clerical coat sleeve. She was a gentle, deprecating old spinster, generally averse to expressing herself aloud. "I was just telling Dr. Fanshaw and Mr. Mears," she said, with a gesture including also Mrs. Knight, Mrs. Crenshaw and the Bettses, "that that was what I call preaching. Good old Gospel from start to finish Mr. Gail!" "Discourses on doctrines and rubrics and laws are very interesting, but it's refreshing to get the straight word of God." She turned to the minister's wife. "Don't you wish the Bishop could have heard him?"

"Evelyn," said the Rev. Marcus Gail, thoughtfully, as once again they crossed the rectory threshold, "You saw my notes yesterday. Did I preach them, or have I that form of mental derangement—is it aphasia?—that would change my personality and my impulses without my knowing it?"

Mrs. Gail's eyes were full of laughter. "You haven't any aphasia," she said. "They have, the dears—the spiritual variety. Here, let's try the concordance again."

But her husband shook his head. "Put away the concordance," he said. "To-morrow, by the grace of God, I'm going to make a house to house canvass, and when I am done they shall understand that especial doctrine they are after and one other—the doctrine of brotherly love."

"And next Sunday?" ventured Mrs. Gail.

"Next Sunday," said the rector, "I'll take the pulpit with no notion of what I am going to say. The Lord will provide."

The Beautiful Collect.

Sometimes to a lover of the Prayer Book the weekly Collects appear as jewels set in the golden chain of the Church year. That for the fourth Sunday after Trinity seems some how the fairest of them all. It may not be richer or rarer than the rest, but it is many-faced and multi-colored, touching our human needs at numberless points, shining with a dozen different lights, like an opal.

On the preceding Sunday the Church petitioned for defence and comfort in the dangers and adversities of our existence; on the Sunday following she will dedicate herself to joyful service in godly quietness. Half way between the two, the Beautiful Collect—sheer poetry from the first word to the last—takes up the whole destiny of man, his present, his past and his future, and lifts it, in a perfect, pure flame of prayer, to heaven. In the opening phrase it affirms the constant protectorship of God: it goes on to acknowledge the weakness and futility of effort apart from Him; it prays for mercy, for rule, for guidance; it implores divine help for the present, on which hangs the imminent long future; and, finally, it invokes the fatherhood of God and the mediatorship of Jesus Christ. In half a hundred words it covers us for life, death and eternity.

This is the collect of utter dependence upon God. No heart can make such a prayer without doffing utterly, as it prays, all false pride, all undue self-confidence, all weak-kneed self-distrust. "O God, the protector of all that trust in Thee, without whom nothing is strong, nothing is holy, increase and multiply upon us Thy mercy; that, Thou being our ruler and guide, we may so pass through things temporal that we finally lose not the things eternal." Here is the echo of the old baptismal prayer—"that he may so pass the waves of this troublesome world that finally he may come to the land of everlasting life," the solemn commendatory words of confirmation service said once more: "that he may be Thine forever . . . until he come at last unto Thine everlasting kingdom." And this same note of human dependence on the divine, this strange linking of life and immortality, sounds still again in the burial of the Church's dead: "Thou knowest, Lord, the secrets of our hearts . . . suffer us not, at our last hour . . . to fall from Thee."

So does the collect for the fourth Sunday after Trinity compass in a few poignant phrases all the span of life here and hereafter. With sublime faith it prays us past things temporal—the storm and the calm, the light and the shadow, the pain and the pleasure of our present brief hour—to the long blessedness of things eternal. Immediately afterward we rise from our knees for the Epistle, and — "I reckon," amends the voice of St. Paul, out of the midst of his own tempestuous share of things temporal, "I reckon that the sufferings of this present world are not to be compared with the glory which shall be revealed."

Thus we come to the conclusion of the whole matter. By the grace of God man passes righteously through this earthly life, to know at last that the hardness which he has endured is in no wise comparable to the happiness that he has finally achieved. If the Christian cannot go forth from this fourth Sunday after Trinity strengthened and cheered, surely it is his own fault. For on this day the Church offers for his soul all that faith and beauty and passionate prayer can compass. To lift our own hearts in such a prayer is inevitably to be blest.

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

W. God Moves in a Mysterious Way.

To those who are familiar with the history of the gentle poet Cowper, the hymn, "God Moves in a Mysterious Way," must always be full of a certain pathetic significance. Beneath the serene faith that breathes through every line of the poem can be traced the suffering and struggle of which that faith was born. The author was afflicted with a distressing form of religious melancholia, and at intervals during his long life was overwhelmed by the despairing conviction that his Maker had deserted him forever. During one of these sad periods he even attempted suicide. The story runs that he set out in his old chaise to drive to the river, where he intended to drown himself, but lost his way in the dark, and his faithful horse, after a long, round-about journey, brought him safely home. It is related also—though accounts differ—that this very poem was the fruit of that night's experience, the reaction from the anguish that had driven him forth on his strange errand. However that may be, the hymn has been a strong bulwark for fainting Christian hearts for nearly a century and a half—particularly the opening lines, where a majestic thought is beautifully and sonorously voiced in a metrical version of one of David's most poetic passages.

God moves in a mysterious way,
His wonders to perform;
He plants His footsteps in the sea,
And rides upon the storm.

Deep in unfathomable mines,
With never-failing skill,
He treasures up His bright designs,
And works His sovereign will.

Ye fearful saints, fresh courage take;
The clouds ye so much dread
Are big with mercy, and shall break
In blessings on your head.

Judge not the Lord by feeble sense,
But trust Him for His grace;
Behind a frowning providence
He hides a smiling face.

His purposes will ripen fast,
Unfolding every hour;
The bud may have a bitter taste,
But sweet will be the flower.

Blind unbelief is sure to err,
And scan His work in vain;
God is His own interpreter,
And He will make it plain.

The Old Home.

An old lane, an old gate, an old house
by a tree;

A wild wood, a wild brook—they will not let me be.

In boyhood I knew them and still they call to me.

Down deep in my heart's core I hear them, and my eyes

Through tear mists behold them beneath the old time skies,

Mid bee bloom and rose bloom and orchard lands arise.

I hear them, and heartsick with longing is my soul.

To walk there, to dream there, beneath the sky's blue bowl—

Around me, within me, the weary world made whole.

To talk with the wild brook of all the long ago;

To whisper the wood wind of things we used to know

When we were old companions, before my heart knew woe.

To walk with the morning and watch its rose unfold;

To drowse with the noontide lulled in its heart of gold;

To lie with the night time and dream
the dreams of old.

To tell to the old trees and to each listening leaf

The longing, the yearning as in my boy-hood brief,

The old hope, the old love, would ease me of my grief.

The old lane, the old gate, the old house
by the tree,

The wild wood, the wild brook—they will not let me be.

In boyhood I knew them and still they call to me.

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

More Substitute Breads.

Last week we offered a number of receipts for "quick" breads; this week we are giving suggestions for potato breads—another good form of kitchen economy. Bread receipts that call for potato substitutes are especially to be recommended because of the big surplus potato crop this year. The formulas have been carefully worked out and are given to the public by the United States Department of Agriculture.

Potato Bread: Mash a cupful of potato until it is free of lumps, then let it cool until it is lukewarm. Mix in a teaspoonful of salt. Add one-sixth to one-half cake of compressed yeast softened in four tablespoonfuls of warm water, or two to four teaspoonfuls of liquid yeast, or half a cake of dry yeast. When liquid yeast is used no additional water should be added. Blend with the potato and yeast mixture one cupful of flour. Stir it until it is smooth, then cover and set it to rise. When the sponge is light and soft, knead in enough flour to make a rather stiff but elastic dough. Be sure that it is stiffer than the ordinary Daisies.

N. B. T.

Daisies, daisies, daisies,
Tippy-toe and light—
Little sunny faces,
Bonnetts ruffled white,

Laughing in the sunlight,
Bowling in the breeze,
Oh, the way you tickle
Fingertips and knees!

Daisies, daisies, daisies,
There're so many of you,
It would take a year to tell
Every one, "I love you!"

Locked In.

Paul and Elsie, with shaggy Rip at their heels, dashed into the barn and swung the doors to behind them. It was a great joke. The three had been spending part of the week at Aunt Hester's, a mile away, and had come back a day earlier than they were expected, because Elsie had become a little homesick.

It was just past sundown when they neared the house. They had made Rip carry the little lunch-basket in his mouth, so that he could not bark, and their plan was to bound suddenly through the kitchen door. That would be splendid. But when they spied mother and Robert in the orchard, they bent themselves double and ran to the barn. They intended to wait there until the family was in the house, and so make the surprise sure. They crouched in the hay-loft, breathless with laughter.

Five minutes passed. "What's that?" asked Elsie, when a sharp click sounded.

"Maybe 'twas the springing of a trap in the corn-house," Paul replied.

"And that?" she asked again, this time a little timidly, for it was growing dark.

"Why, that's the horses eating in their stalls," her brother answered. "I hadn't noticed that they'd been fed. Come along; mother and Bob are surely in the kitchen by this time." He flung himself eagerly against the doors—double doors they were, fastened together. They did not yield. He shoved again, hard, but they merely gave a little. Paul and Elsie and Rip, who still held the basket in his mouth, looked at each other. They were locked in.

The stable was far from the house, and tightly built; they were not likely to make themselves heard. Aunt Hester thought them at home, and home thought them at Aunt Hester's; so no one would be in the least uneasy. And by this time it was quite dark.

The boy felt his heart beating, but he squared his shoulders. Elsie must not be frightened. She was older than he, but smaller, and she did not like adventures. Still, she must know the truth. He told her, in a clear voice.

"Not spend the night in here?" She could hardly believe her ears.

"There's no help for it," Paul said, stoutly. "We'll shout a while."

So they called lustily; Rip put down his burden and barked in eager concert, but no reply came.

Nothing was left to do but get ready for the night—such a queer night! A sob broke from Elsie once, but she swallowed back its mate when Paul put a steady arm round her. The weather was mild. They cuddled down in the hay, and were warm and comfortable. Rip curled against them, and every time they stirred he thumped his tail softly.

It grew darker and darker; then, after a while, the moon rose, and it grew lighter. The horses mumbled and crunched in their stalls. "This is Star right below us," said Paul.

Everything became very drowsy and still. "This is all right," spoke Paul, and his voice sounded far away. "We're snug as bugs in a rug—just as snug as—bugs—as bugs—"

It seemed only a little while before there was another whinny and bark, and the two sleepers started up. It was broad daylight, and long spears of sunshine struck through the knot-holes and pierced the hay. Some one was fumbling with the lock. The doors flew wide.

"Well!" exclaimed the hired man's voice. "Well, I wonder what I have found here!"

"Upon my word!" cried their father, who was just behind him.

The three made a wild rush. Elsie clambered to her father's shoulder; Rip barked, and Paul stood with his hands in his pockets.

"Tramps, as I'm alive!" the hired man declared. "Walking out of an honest man's barn as big and as bold as you please!"

Fifteen minutes later they were washed and brushed and busily eating breakfast. At last Elsie looked up from her last spoonful of oatmeal and said:

"I would not mind being a really truly lady tramp if I could tramp with Paul and Rip and have father's barn to sleep in every night."—The Youth's Companion.

A Story of India.

Mildred Stribling Ribble.

This story was told me by a soldier who lived in India, and if you are afraid of tigers you had better not read any further.

I shall begin this, "Once upon a time," because that is the way all stories should begin. Well, once upon a time, when this soldier was a little boy in India, where his father had gone as a missionary to the poor heathen, he started out on a real hunting trip with two other little boys. He did not know then just how much of a hunting trip it was going to be, or I don't think he would have gone. But this little boy was very adventurous, and his mother had a hard time keeping him in the house, so off he went this time, just as usual. He had a very good gun and he kept it loaded in case they met any little animals on the way.

Up in the Punjab there are some very high hills, and many of these have little winding paths that carry you on and on just as a path sometimes does in America. These little boys climbed briskly and they talked about what they would do if "something happened," for boys are always expecting wonderful things when they go out together. And in India things are always happening.

"I'd just as lief see a tiger as not, long's this gun stays loaded," said the minister's son. "If she was to bust loose 'twouldn't be any nice place for a tiger, I tell you."

Robert and Toby, the other boys, were just as loud in their opinions. "Guess he wouldn't, with three of us ready to shoot all at once. Lieutenant Heatherstone says there's one awful old yellow one up here somewhere."

"Wouldn't it be fun to see them old eyes jus' glarin' at you?" Robert asked. "Would you be skeered, John? Gee, I'd shiver right down to my toes, and then I'd bang so loud they could hear me way over yonder in England. Lieutenant Heatherstone says he's goin' to get him one 'fore he goes home, sure's he's alive."

So up and up and up that winding path went that valiant three, with their little guns bristling in front of them, and their bright eyes peering into the bushes. It was such fun climbing, and all the time one went higher and higher until one tried to guess just what would be over the top of that next beautiful hill. The minister's son was just a little behind the rest, looking out for a snake or two, perhaps, for he really felt very well acquainted with snakes. He heard Robert and Toby talking in a contented way, but he did not join in, for he was always thinking out a new plan and keeping it to himself. So just when they reached the top of the beautiful hill he looked up, and there were the Glaring Eyes they had been talking about, and the big awful body stiffening before their very sight.

The minister's son doesn't remember exactly what he felt, but he does remember all about the Yellow One. He heard a soft little sound beside him as Robert and Toby gently fainted, and then he pointed his good little gun at the tiger and let her "bust loose." That is all he remembers. You see, he felt sort of sick and dreamy and unreal himself for a few minutes, and he saw his mother like a sharp picture before his eyes—but that is all. When he got up again the world was still turning a bit, but the Yellow One was lying peacefully on one side very close to Robert and Toby, and over the hill came a party of British officers with Lieutenant Heatherstone at the head.

"Well, Johnny," said the lieutenant. He went over and felt the big tiger, and then he shook hands with the minister's son very gravely. By that time Robert and Toby were opening their eyes, and some of the soldiers helped them to their feet and promised them a ride home. It took three of the natives to tie the tiger's feet together, and then they put a pole under them and swung him over their shoulders. Robert and Toby were riding limply in front of two of the officers.

"You'll get a nice little sum for our friend," the lieutenant told John, pointing to the tiger. "He was marked. How in the world did you happen to make such a clean shot?"

"The gun was pointed that way," said the minister's son. "I forget the rest."

The Test.

"But, father, it's not wrong."

"No," said the man slowly, "it's not."

"Then I may go!" exclaimed the boy happily. "It will be loads of fun!"

"Son, you are old enough to decide for yourself, and I won't say you may or may not go. I would rather leave the decision entirely with you."

"But you don't want me to go?" said the boy reluctantly.

"You've heard my objections, but, as you say, it's not wrong, and you are to decide for yourself."

"I wish you would not put it that way. I want to go so much; it will be such a jolly crowd and they will have a splendid time. Please say you think it will be all right."

"Son, I don't want to preach at you, and I don't want to prejudice you in your decision, but I want to remind you of one thing. This is not a question of good or bad; it is a decision between good and best. If it was the question of right or wrong, I know you wouldn't hesitate; in fact, I think there would only be a little temptation for you. It is in choosing the best that the test comes."

"So many of us are satisfied if we just crawl out of the muck of wrong, and don't try to climb up to the hills of better and best. The world, as a rule, is satisfied with the merely good. So the sacrifice—for in choosing the best we usually have to make some sacrifice—seems to be unnecessary. But every time you have a chance to choose, and you choose the best, your character grows a little stronger, purer and higher. And when you decide that the merely good is sufficient, your character softens a little."

"Sometimes men are made famous in a moment by the hard choice of the best; famous men have been ruined by failing to take the highest way. The law may make you choose the good, but only with the help of God can you choose the best."

There was silence in the room for a few minutes; then the boy heard the shrill whistle of his chum, and hurried out to answer it.

The man sat and wondered; but the boy did not go.—The Youth's Companion.

"I've Thought of Somebody."

I've thought of somebody—a man. He was the son of a good father, and the grandson of a very, very great and good man. He had one brother with whom he frequently quarreled; once they had a serious quarrel that almost cost him his life—he had to leave home and go into another part of the country. On one occasion this young man sadly deceived his aged father. Once, when he was journeying to the home of a relative, he slept by the roadside and had a beautiful and wonderful dream, such as few men dream. Another time he had a remarkable experience beside the bank of a river, near dawn. He married the daughter of his kinsman, and after a long time grew to love his brother again.

Who was the young man?

Answer to last week's question: Joshua and Caleb.

An American Godmother.

Every morning since Marius could remember, when his father left for work in the great sugar refineries, he had waved good-bye to his little son. And every morning his pretty mother had stood in the doorway smiling.

That was four years ago. Then Marius and his father and mother lived in Roze, on the Arve River, one of those smiling little villages of France that look from afar like a knot of flowers in the sun, so clean and shining were the houses with their gay little gardens.

Although Marius was but four years old, he never will forget that summer day. He had been so happy, he and his pretty mother and his kind father. He had watched his mother wash the breakfast dishes. He had seen her make up his little bed and spread the clean quilt over the big bed in the corner of their sunny bedroom. He had heard the children in the neighborhood laughing and playing, shouting in joy because school had closed two days before. While his mother ironed his little frocks he had played with his toys.

Later in the day his mother had given him some candy to eat, and he had given a piece to his dog, Bobo. Candy to his dog! Then his mother had dressed him in a clean frock, and he was sitting on the doorstep eating bread and milk, real milk with a spoon from a clean bowl. His pretty mother had a flower in her dark hair, and she came to the door just as Marius saw his father coming down the village street. His father did not wave his cap as was his custom, but hurried up the path to their home. His face was very grave, and he talked rapidly: "The Germans have crossed the Belgian frontier!"

"Vive la France!" his brave little mother had shouted, although her cheek had paled. And then there were tears and confusion.

In a little while his father, looking brave and fine, had on his beautiful uniform of France. He took Marius in his arms, and there were tears in his eyes as he said: "My son, my little son!"

"Vive la France!" again cried his brave little mother, holding in her hand the beloved tri-colored flag. Instantly his father had stiffened, standing straight and tall, and had saluted the flag.

Then down the village street, under the long waving boughs of the elm trees, Marius saw his father march away. "Good-bye, papa, good-bye," he had shouted, waving his baby hand. And in the doorway his mother bravely smiled. That was four years ago.

It is hard for Marius to remember all that happened in the weeks that followed. He knows they were full of sadness; that his mother shed many tears; that one day she fell to the floor and was very still. Then his grandmother came and told him that his brave father had died for France. And baby though he was, he seemed somehow to know that his pretty mother had died for France, too.

When the horde of German invaders came to Roze there was more confusion. There was fighting in all the streets. The Mayor's office was blown up, and the most beautiful buildings were burned down. Not even the great church where Marius used to go on Sunday was spared. The tower was thrown down, and the beautiful statue of the infant Jesus in His mother's arms was crushed and broken. All that the brutal Germans could do to frighten the people was done.

Mercifully the cruel sights his baby eyes saw had little meaning to Marius. Of those weary days he remembers little. He knows that he cried often because he was hungry and afraid. He knows, too, that he cried, but with gladness in his heart, when the brave poilus, beloved soldiers of La Belle France, recaptured all that remains of the once prosperous commune of Roze.

True, there are a few houses in the Quartier de l'Arve left standing. But they are mere shells of wood and stone.

All the food and money and clothes, all the grain and vegetables, all the zinc, copper, lead, tin, iron, and bronze, and hundreds of mothers and young girls have been taken far away to Germany. There are no chairs or tables or dishes, no knives or forks or spoons, no beds or stoves, no shelter.

The old women and the old, old men and little children were left amid the ruins. Marius and his grandmother were there not daring to hunt for one pathetic token in the charred embers of their home, lest treasure might conceal a hidden mine of explosives that would blow off a little hand or put out the light of baby eyes, so cunning and treacherous have been these "tricks" of the barbarians who have used all the infernal cruelties they could invent in making war.

But, O, the joy of being able once more to shout "Vive la France!"

When Marius tried it, his shout was feeble; for he was very, very weak. In all the weary, weary months he and his old grandmother had lived behind the enemy lines they had not had enough food to keep them from being hungry all the time. But with the brave poilus came the American Red Cross with food, not much, but a little, more than Marius and his grandmother had had for a long, long time.

"Vive la Croix Rouge!" Marius had shouted when he and his grandmother and all the old women and the old, old men and the little children left in Roze had eaten hot soup and a little bread. And he walked straight up to a Red Cross attendant and with his thin, clawlike little hand gravely saluted.

The attendant, an American, was not ashamed of his tears. The child had a look about him that made the kind man's heart ache. He looked from Marius to the thin, pale faces of all the other blameless little ones. "Want ed," he said under his breath, "American godmothers."

And that is how it happened that after a little while this letter from far-away France came to America:

"My Dear Madam,—I am very grateful for the good you do for me and very grateful that I know how to write and tell you so. It is surely my father and mother in heaven who have sent you to aid me and my good grandmother who works so hard to care for me so well.

"My papa has been killed. He died for France, my country. I have much grief, but I am proud to be his boy. My poor mother died of grief.

"You are a very good lady to interest yourself in me, and I shall think often of you, thanking you.

"You ask me what I do. I am six hours in school—three in the morning and three in the afternoon. I count, I read, I write. Now that I have an American godmother, I want you to be proud of me.

"I love well my good grandmother, who is so kind to me. She says to tell you the presence of our brave Allies from America encourages our brave soldiers of France to resist even to the end these Germans who have taken away our homes and destroyed our beautiful cities.

"Receive, dear madam, my loving kisses. I am now eight years old.

"MARIUS ROUNET."

The Crow That Wasn't Afraid.

"I believe they laugh at my scarecrow," grandpa said. He was talking of the crows that were digging his corn.

"Yes, they do; I heard 'em," Perley cried. "They got together in a regular conflagration (Perley meant congregation) and laughed out loud—O, very loud—"Caw, caw, caw!" If that isn't their way of saying, "Haw, haw, haw!" then I'm mistaken."

Grandpa smiled. But it got to be no smiling matter at all. Things began to look serious indeed out in the corn patch. At last grandpa came in to breakfast one morning looking quite satisfied and happy. "I've got 'em now," he said complacently.

"Got who, David?" dear old grandpa asked.

"The crows, every mother's son of 'em! Let 'em dig up my corn rows now if they dare. I've spread that enormous blue umbrella that the whole family used to go to meeting under when I was a boy. They'll be afraid to come near it. I've got it out there in the middle of my corn patch looking like a giant mushroom."

"Or a circus tent," put in Perley gleefully.

Grandpa had been walking all around the corn patch in a triumphant procession of his own. "I guess they'll laugh on the other side of their mouths now," he exulted.

But that noon, at dinner time, Perley came in out of the blazing sunlight with his little red, moist face drawn down lengthily. He waited till after grandpa asked the blessing and filled all the plates. It was hard work to "break it" to grandpa; but when you have a thing to do, you had better do it before you begin on your mashed potatoes and chicken. It was good reasoning, and Perley straightened in his chair. "Grandpa," he said solemnly, "there's a crow sitting under that umbrella down in the corn patch. I saw him. He looked real cool and comfortable, out o' the sun!"—Primary Education.

Besides her husband, Mrs. Hubbard is survived by five children—Mrs. John Bell Henneman, Pocahontas Bolling Hubard, Philip E. Hubard, of Buckingham; Robert T. Hubard, Jr., of Fayetteville, W. Va., and Rev. Lyttleton E. Hubard, of Elizabeth, N. J.; six grandchildren and one brother, Lyttleton Edmunds, of Houston, Va.

The translation to higher service of one so useful and beloved fills many hearts with sorrow and a deep sense of loss. As wife and mother she beautified these sacred relations, and leaves to her loved ones a rich heritage and precious memories. The keynote of her life was love, which she gave and inspired throughout, bearing a long illness, as one who ministered to her said, "So as to make it easier for us." To her family her loss is irreparable, yet they have the consolation of knowing that her pure spirit, free from all weariness and pain, is safe in the Paradise of God.

Walker: Entered into rest, at Smithfield, Va., on Friday, May 10, RICHARD WALKER, in the sixty-fifth year of his age. Though in feeble health for the past three years, the end came quietly and unexpectedly.

Mr. Walker was a pioneer citizen of Newport News, a member of Bremond Lodge of Masons, and a faithful and devoted member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church. He had represented his church in several meetings of the Diocesan Council, and for many years had been a Trustee and Junior Warden of his parish.

In his passing, the community loses a citizen of high character, the church a valued officer and devout member, whose pew was never vacant even in the years of his failing health.

Few men, if any, ever loved their church more than Richard Walker, nor gave more unstintingly of time and means than he.

He was laid to rest in beautiful Greenmount Cemetery in Baltimore with the simple Rites of the Church and the Masonic fraternity.

He is survived by his wife and one son, Richard, Jr. May a double portion of his spirit rest upon the boy, who was the pride and joy of his father's life.

IN MEMORIAM.

MRS. SUSAN SMITH HATHAWAY, wife of Hon. Walter E. Hathaway, died May 26 at Enon Hall, her home in Lancaster County, Va., in the forty-second year of her age. She was a native of North Carolina, and was educated at Gatesville Academy and St. Mary's School at Raleigh in that State.

Nearly thirty years ago she was confirmed by the late Bishop Watson, of Eastern North Carolina. Possessed of remarkable executive ability and great personal charms, she became a most zealous and efficient worker in all church and charitable activities. She was an enthusiastic member of the United Daughters of the Confederacy, and from the entrance of this country into the great war had been an indefatigable worker in the Red Cross, having filled the office of Secretary of Lancaster Chapter of that organization, and just a few days prior to her death been appointed Executive Secretary of the Home Service Section. Endowed with fine natural gifts of mind and heart, she made friends of all who came within the sphere of her influence, and in her home she dispensed a graceful hospitality. She was a dutiful and affectionate daughter, a loving and faithful wife, a wise and devoted mother, and a kind and helpful neighbor. She is survived by her husband, and three children, and also by her venerable father, Dr. R. C. Smith. Just before her death her eldest son, of whom she was justly proud, had sailed to join the American forces in France.

Mrs. Hathaway was buried near her home, Enon Hall, May 28, Rev. L. R. Combs, assisted by Rev. Mr. Essex, pastor of the Baptist Church, officiating. Many floral tributes of affection were brought, the chiefest being a large red cross from the members of that organization.

MINUTE ON THE DEATH OF BISHOP RANDOLPH.

At a meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary and High School in Virginia, on June 5, 1918, the following minute was adopted:

The announcement of the death of the Rt. Rev. Alfred Magill Randolph, D. D.,

Bishop of Southern Virginia, after many years of faithful and loving service as a Trustee of the Theological Seminary and Episcopal High School in Virginia, has been received with deep sorrow and with a sense of personal loss by the members of the Board.

The intimate fellowship of those who have the care of these schools, which mean so much to the Church, is unlike the relation between the governing boards of other institutions, and so, when our ranks are thinned by death, it means more than a mere change in the official membership of the Board.

Bishop Randolph, who has served for thirty-five years as a Trustee, a longer time than that of any other member except our honored Treasurer of many years—who, thank God, is still with us—was the last survivor of that group of Bishops who had a large part in the charge of the interests of the Seminary and High School in the years when the problems of maintenance were more acute than they are to-day. Bishop Johns, Bishop Whittle, Bishop Peterkin, Bishop Randolph—they have all passed to the Church above. The work that they did, however, is largely responsible for the present vitality and prosperity of these schools. They especially did much to create the atmosphere which marks the Theological Seminary and High School.

With Bishop Randolph, as with the others, the service on the Board of Trustees was a part of the ministry of Christ. His broad scholarship, his unique personality, his genial humor, his high standards of life and the ministry, enabled Bishop Randolph to add much to the welfare of both institutions. He loved them and was ready to labor in every way for their interests.

We shall miss the charm of his companionship, the help of his sympathy and experience of life, but we thank God for the memory of his long and faithful service and for the inspiration, which will abide through the years to come.

Bishop Randolph graduated at the Seminary, and was ordained sixty years ago this month. His name has been transferred to the list of the Alumni, whose names in the catalogue are designated by a star. It may be because God has fulfilled for them the promise—

"They that turn many to righteousness shall shine
As the stars for ever and for ever."

Resolved, That the Board of Trustees convey to the wife of Bishop Randolph, who has shared his long and blessed ministry, and to his children the assurance of their deep sympathy in their bereavement and of their prayers that God may solace and help them.

Resolved, That this minute be published in the Southern Churchman.

RHEUMATISM AND INDIGESTION.

Practically all physicians and medical writers are agreed that there is a close relationship between Indigestion and Rheumatism. This view is substantiated by the fact that Shivar Spring Water, which is probably the best American mineral water for Dyspepsia and Indigestion, relieves Rheumatism and the rheumatoid diseases such as Gout, Sciatica, Neuralgia and Nervous Headache. All of these diseases are probably related and all are probably due in whole or in part to imperfect digestion or to imperfect assimilation of food. Physicians who have studied this water and who have observed its effects in their practice believe that it relieves these maladies by rendering the digestion complete and perfect and thereby preventing the formation of those poisons which inflame the joints and irritate the nerves, and also by eliminating, through the kidneys, such poisons as have already been formed.

The following letters are interesting in this connection. Dr. Crosby, a South Carolina physician, writes:—"I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of Rheumatism, Chronic Indigestion, Kidney and Bladder troubles and in Nervous and Sick Headaches and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time, will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the Liver, Kidneys and Bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter."

Dr. Avant of Savannah writes:—"I suffered for years with a most aggravating form of stomach disorder and consulted a number of our best local physicians, went to Baltimore and consulted specialists there and still I was not benefited. I had about despaired of living when I began to use Shivar Spring Water and in a short time was cured."

Mr. Rhodes of Virginia writes:—"Please send me ten gallons of Shivar Spring Water quickly. I want it for Rheumatism. I know of several who were cured of Rheumatism with this water."

Editor Cunningham writes:—"The water has done more good than any medicine I have ever taken for Rheumatism. Am entirely free from pain."

Mr. McClam of South Carolina writes:—"My wife has been a sufferer from Rheumatism and after drinking twenty gallons of your Mineral Water, was entirely cured of the horrible disease."

Mr. Carter of Virginia writes:—"Mrs. Carter has had enlarged joints upon her hands, caused by Rheumatism. Shivar Spring Water removed every trace of the enlargement. The water is simply excellent."

If you suffer with Rheumatism, or with any chronic disease, accept the guarantee offer below by signing your name. Clip and mail to the Shivar Spring,

Box 64-S, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Spring Water. These City Physicians Explain Why They Prescribe Nuxated Iron To Make Healthier Women and Stronger, Sturdier Men

NOW BEING USED BY OVER THREE MILLION PEOPLE ANNUALLY

By enriching the blood and creating thousands of new red blood cells, it often quickly transforms the flabby flesh, toneless tissues, and pallid cheeks of weak, anaemic men and women into a glow of health. Increases the strength of delicate, nervous, run-down folks in two weeks' time in many instances.

It is conservatively estimated that over three million people annually in this country alone are taking Nuxated Iron. Such astonishing results have been reported from its use both by doctors and laymen, that a number of physicians in various parts of the country have been asked to explain why they prescribe it so extensively, and why it apparently produces so much better results than were obtained from the old forms of inorganic iron.

Extracts from some of the letters received are given below.

Dr. Ferdinand King, a New York Physician and Medical Author, says: "There can be no vigorous iron men without iron. Pallor means an anemia. A anemia means iron deficiency. The skin of anaemic men and women is pale; the flesh flabby. The muscles lack tone, the brain fags and the memory fails and they become weak, nervous, irritable, despondent and melancholy. When the iron goes from the blood of women the roses go from their cheeks.

"In the most common foods of America, the starches, sugars, table syrups, candies, polished rice, white bread, soda crackers, biscuits, macaroni, spaghetti, tapioca, sago, farina, degenerated corn-meal, no longer is iron to be found. Refining processes have removed the iron of Mother Earth from these impoverished foods, and silly methods of home cookery, by throwing down the waste—the water in which our vegetables are cooked—is responsible for another grave iron loss.

"Therefore you should supply the iron deficiency in your food by using some form of organic iron, just as you would use salt when your food has not enough salt."

Dr. A. J. Newman, late Police Surgeon of the City of Chicago and former House Surgeon, Jefferson Park Hospital, Chicago, in commenting on Nuxated Iron, says: "It has been my particular duty during the past six years to assist in keeping Chicago's five thousand blue-coats in good health and perfect fighting trim so that they would be physically equipped to withstand all manner of and the ravages of nature's elements.

"Recently I was prompted through an endorsement of Nuxated Iron by Dr. Schuyler C. Jaques, formerly Visiting Surgeon of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, New York, to give it a trial. This remedy has proven through my own tests of it to excel any preparation I have ever used for creating red blood, building up the nerves, strengthening the muscles and correcting digestive disorders."

Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), N. Y., and the Westchester County Hospital, said: "I have strongly emphasized the great necessity of physicians making blood examinations of their weak, anaemic, run-down patients. Thousands of persons go on year after year suffering from physical weakness and a highly nervous condition due to lack of sufficient iron in their red blood corpuscles, without ever realizing the real and true cause of their trouble. Without iron in your blood your food merely passes through the body, somewhat like corn through an old mill with rollers so wide apart that the mill can't grind.

"But in my opinion you can't make strong, vigorous, successful, sturdy iron men by feeding them on metallic iron. The old forms of metallic iron go through a semi-digestive process to transform them into organic iron—Nuxated Iron—before they are so ready to be taken up and assimilated by the human system.

"Notwithstanding all that has been said and written on this subject by well-known physicians, thousands of people still insist in dosing themselves with metallic iron simply, I suppose, because it costs a few cents less. I strongly advise readers in all cases, to get a physician's prescription for organic iron—Nuxated Iron—or if you don't want to go to this trouble then purchase only Nuxated iron in its original packages and see that this particular name (Nuxated Iron) appears on the package. If you have taken preparations such as Nux and Iron and other similar iron products and failed to get results, remember that such products are an entirely different thing from Nuxated Iron."

Dr. Schuyler C. Jaques, formerly Visiting Surgeon of St. Elizabeth's Hospital, of New York City, said: "I have never before given out any medical information or advice for publication, as I ordinarily do not believe in it. But in the case of Nuxated Iron I feel I would be remiss in my duty not to mention it. I have taken it myself and given it to my patients with most surprising and satisfactory results. And those who wish quickly to increase their strength, power and endurance will find it a most remarkable and wonderfully effective remedy."

Dr. T. Alphonsus Wallace, a physician of many years' experience in this country and abroad, says: "I do not make a practice of recommending advertised medicinal products, but I have found Nuxated Iron so potent in nervous, run-down conditions, that I believe all should know of it. The men and women of today need more iron in their blood than was the case twenty or thirty years ago. This because of the demineralized diet which now is served daily in thousands of homes and also because of the demand for greater resistance necessary to offset the greater number of health hazards, to be met at every turn."

If people would only take Nuxated Iron when they feel weak or run-down, instead of dosing themselves with habit-forming drugs, stimulants and alcoholic beverages, there are probably thousands who might readily build up their red blood corpuscles, increase their physical energy and get themselves into a condition to ward off the millions of disease germs that are almost continually around us. It is surprising how many people suffer from iron deficiency and do not know it.

If you are not strong or well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see how much you have gained. Numbers of nervous, run-down people who were ailing all the while have most astonishingly increased their strength and endurance simply by taking iron in the proper form. And this, after they had in some cases been going on for months without getting benefit from anything. Many an athlete and prize-fighter has won the day simply because he knew the secret of great strength and endurance which comes from having plenty of iron in the blood; while many another has gone down in inglorious defeat simply for lack of iron.

Manufacturers Note: Nuxated Iron, which is prescribed and recommended above by physicians, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser, or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists and general stores.

dough. Cover and let it rise again until it is very light. Knead down, mould, and place in a lightly greased pan. After it has risen to the ordinary height, bake it at least one hour in a moderately hot oven. This makes one loaf.

Potato Biscuit: Sift twice together two cupfuls of flour, a teaspoonful of salt and three teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Cut or rub into this three tablespoonfuls of cold shortening, and in the same way rub in a cupful of mashed potato. Add just enough liquid to make the mass stick together. Do not knead the dough; roll it out to the thickness of half an inch and cut it into rounds. Bake in lightly floured biscuit tins from fifteen to twenty minutes. All potato breads should be baked more slowly than those made with flour alone. In using liquids allowance should be made for the large amount of water in potatoes.

The Sense of Sin.

If you want to find those who have the keenest sense of sin, you will not find them among the reprobates or among the newly repentant, but among the experienced and maturing saints. It is at the beginning of the Christian life, when the great heights of holiness are still to climb, that the sense of sin and unworthiness is most imperfectly developed. It is growth in grace that deepens the consciousness of the blackness of personal sin and that makes confession of sin the painful wail of the soul. And so it is among the holy ones that you hear the most heart-sick expressions of sin.—J. H. Jowett.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

To make another person hold his tongue, be you first silent.

Our heaviest burdens are those we have no business to pick up.

The smallest man on the face of the earth is the one who sees only himself.

One reason why people make crooked paths is because they keep looking back.

Only so far as a man believes strongly can he act cheerfully or do anything that is worth doing.

There is something the matter with our religion if we never pray except when we feel like it.

Edward Thring wrote out this prayer when he was a student at Cambridge: "O God, give me work till the end of my life, and life till the end of my work; for Christ's sake. Amen."

If you are on a railway train, your falling asleep will not hinder you from reaching your journey's end. If you are in Christ you will pass into glory, even though you may do so in a state of insensibility.

We need to cultivate the sense of God. If we had a friend to whom we never wrote or spoke and of whom we almost never thought, she would soon cease to be a friend. God wants to be thought of, to have all of life referred to Him, to be made the central power in our lives.

"Be still and know that I am God." As soon as we calm our hearts, as soon as we let our spirits grow still enough to receive it, the sense of God begins to shine within us. Stormy waters, all wind ruffled and rough, cannot clearly reflect the beauty of blue skies until they are still.

Heaven is but a strange city to most of us until our dear ones go to occupy its mansions. Then it becomes to us the home-land, and an ardent longing takes hold of our souls to walk the blessed streets where God the Father and our kindred are. Some noble families have titles but no estates. It is not so with the children of God. The inheritance of the just is glorious, reserved for them in heaven.

"If you are tempted to reveal
A tale some one to you, has told
About another, make it pass,
Before you speak, three gates of gold."

"Three narrow gates—first, 'Is it true?'
Then, 'Is it needful?' In your mind
Give truthful answer, and the next
Is last and narrowest, 'Is it kind?'"

Our religion shares too much in the faults of the age in which we live. It is too public, too outspoken, conducted too much as a business; and so the inner and contemplative element is too much lost sight of. The silence of self-examination, the silence of the heart's unsyllabled supplication, the silence of meditation on the mysteries of redeeming love—these are forms of silence which every one must observe often who would have the flame of spiritual life to burn bright and clear in his soul.

Our course is onward, onward into light:

What though the darkness gathereth again,

Yet to return or tarry, both are vain. How tarry, when around us is thick night?

Whither return? What flower yet ever might,

In days of gloom and cold and stormy rain,

Enclose itself in its green bud again, Hiding from wrath of tempest out of sight?

Courage—we travel through a darksome cave;

But still as nearer to the light we draw,

Fresh gales will reach us from the upper air,

And wholesome dew of heaven our foreheads lave;

The darkness lighten more, till full of awe

We stand in open sunshine unaware.

—Abp. Trench.

The Father's House.

Death for the Christian involves no absolute break in the soul's life; it involves merely a passing from one apartment of God's house to another. The dead in Christ are still living in the Father's house and still enjoy, though in an increased measure, that same fellowship with the Father and Son they enjoyed on earth. Heaven is as truly home to them as any place they have ever known. "In the Father's house are many mansions." This life does not exhaust the good; it is but the commencement and foretaste of the greater good to come.—Presbyterian.

PERSONAL NOTES.

and Bishop Paddock were also present.

On the first Sunday after Trinity in the Cathedral, Chicago, Ill., Mr. Bertram Smith, a United States Marine stationed at Santa Domingo, was ordained to the diaconate. Mr. Smith was granted a furlough by his commander in order to apply for ordination.

In St. John's Church, Ogdensburg, N. Y., on Trinity Sunday, Bishop Nelson advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. William Johnson Gage and Charles Gregory Prout, who were presented by the Rev. John Prout. Bishop Nelson preached the sermon, and the Rev. D. Charles White and the Rev. Charles Temple, D. D., assisted in the service.

On the first Sunday after Trinity, in Trinity Church, Granville, N. Y., the Rev. Benjamin Louis Ramsey was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Nelson, who also preached the sermon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Albert Gale. Mr. Ramsay continues in charge of Trinity Church, Granville.

In the Bethlehem Chapel of the Cathedral, Washington, D. C., on the first Sunday after Trinity, Bishop Harding ordained to the diaconate Frank Norman Fitzpatrick (colored), presented by the Rev. William L. DeVries; and advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Charles E. McAllister, presented by the Rev. Dr. Robert Talbot; the Rev. Harry Speake Cobey and the Rev. Sidney Wallace, presented by the Rev. Dr. DeVries. The Rev. Walden Myer, Canon of the Cathedral, preached the sermon. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop. The Rev. Mr. Fitzpatrick has undertaken work under Bishop Brooke in a colored mission in Oklahoma. Mr. McAllister is rector of St. Matthew's Parish, Hyattsville, Md. Mr. Cobey is assistant minister of St. Paul's Church, Rock Creek Parish, Washington. Mr. Wallace is in charge of St. John's Church, Waterbury, Conn., during the absence of the Rev. John N. Lewis, Jr., who has gone for war work overseas.

On Friday, June 14, Bishop Darlington ordained to the diaconate in St. Matthew's Church, Sunbury, Pa., Charles Nelson Thomas, Joseph Herbert Bond and Clayton E. B. Robinson. These were presented by the Rev. Lewis Nichols, of St. Paul's, Lock Haven. He also ordained to the priesthood the Rev. James Hart Lamb, Jr. Mr. Lamb was presented by his father, the Rev. James Hart Lamb, D. D., rector emeritus at St. Davids, Radnor, and his two brothers, the Rev. Addison A. Lamb, of Trinity Church, Coatesville, and the Rev. George Warrington Lamb, of Radnor, Pa. The sermon was by the Rev. James Hart Lamb, D. D. The Rev. F. M. C. Bedell, of Trinity Church, Shamokin, conducted the quiet hour with the ordinands just previous to the ordination.

Mr. Thomas will remain in charge of the Church of Our Saviour at Montoursville. Mr. Bond will take charge of St. Luke's, Blossburg and other missions in the vicinity. Mr. Robinson will take charge of Christ Church, Lykens, St. Paul's, Williamstown, and St. Bartholomew's, Millerstown, Pa.

Mr. Gordon Reese, of Lancaster, Pa., a graduate of the Virginia Seminary, was also to have been ordained at this time, but he has accepted work with the Y. M. C. A. abroad and his ordination has been deferred a year.

Deaths.

Mr. John Clayton Rutter, who was to have been ordained by Bishop Darlington with the class on June 14, was accidentally and fatally shot in the eye a few days previously. His funeral took place from St. Paul's, Bloomsburg, Pa., on June 13, the day before that set for his ordination to the diaconate. His intention was to enter the army after his ordination. Bishop Darlington officiated at the funeral. There were present of the clergy the Rev. F. O. Musser, rector of St. Paul's, Bloomsburg; the Rev. R. P. Kreidler, of St. Luke's, Scranton; the Rev. W. A. Sparks, of Far Rockaway, L. I.; the Rev. M. H. Ake, of Christ Church, Berwick. Mr. Rutter's certificate of ordination had been made out beforehand and was presented to his parents.

Unfold Thy banners, Prince of Peace!
And lead us on our way.
Unsheathe Thy sword, O God of love!
Be Captain of to-day,
That peace may fight and love may win
Each battle as we go,
And as our Captain is above,

Give to Thy servants strength of heart
To follow all Thy lead,
And bravely, as a soldier ought,
No consequence to heed.

Be ours to do Thy word,
And learn, what this one day can teach,
Of Thy great goodness, Lord.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great.
In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.
Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

THE SPIRITUAL SIDE OF THE WAR.

Christian America cannot be too devoutly thankful, since we must needs be at war, that the motives which led us into it and the ends for which we are fighting are of so high a character. We can imagine how it might have been otherwise—that the country might have become involved in a foreign broil for commercial supremacy or in defense of material advantages, and patriotism, declaring with a sigh, "Right or wrong, my Country!" had taken up arms reluctantly and with a divided conscience. How hard it would be to go through this war under a cloud of doubt as to the righteousness of it, suspecting the reasons by which we justified it, staggered as we balanced the terrible cost against the pitiable result to be gained. Thank God, we are troubled by no such questionings. Conscious of the integrity of our purposes and constrained by the highest motives which can appeal to the candid mind and generous heart, we count no sacrifice too great to match with the prize we seek for ourselves and for humanity. It is for this reason that the hearts of our own and the allied peoples are beating today as the heart of one man. It could not be so unless, in a measure at least, greed and selfishness had been displaced by better inducements and worthier aims.

For the same reason, as a secondary result or by-product of the war, we are looking for higher standards in political and social life than have prevailed heretofore. The nations, we are saying, cannot pass through these experiences and make these sacrifices, not only for themselves but for each other and for peoples yet unborn, without a lasting effect upon their character and a far-reaching advance in their ideals. The essential brotherhood of the human family, the impossibility of caste or tribal arrogance and domination, the sanctity of the rights and liberties of the weakest and poorest, the meanness of shirking and self-seeking, the necessity and nobility of generous, unselfish service—these are lessons which are being branded upon the consciousness of mankind and that cannot well be forgotten while the memory of these days remains. Men will return from battle, or will lay down the burdens and relax the anxieties they have freely borne at home, with new conceptions of duty, new insight into the realities, new ideals of social righteousness, new visions of the dignity and blessedness of life consecrated to high purposes. The Cross will stand out more clearly as the standard of life. So we hope and believe; but vaguely perhaps, and with too little thought of antecedent conditions necessary to secure these results as permanent and vitalizing elements in the character of our nation and people.

It is easy for us to fall into the vice of looking to merely natural means or psychological causes to bring about reformation and social regeneration. But to Christian thought no argument is needed to show how limited both in scope and force are all these things which the wit of man can devise or his will create, and how unavailing to cure the ills from which society suffers and individuals perish. The root of evil is too deep to be eradicated by human expedients or natural experiences. Not even the dire forces of war, the greatest war of history, with all its horrors and sufferings and sacrifices and hardly-won victory at the end, can do more than uncover and expose its baneful effects. Any salvation worthy of the name, whether personal or social, is a spiritual process and begins with that homely and radical grace of repentance towards God.

To overlook this, or even too readily to take it for granted, will mean to miss the greatest benefit which the war might bring. It is not needful for us to formulate a complete theory of the Divine purposes intended by the war or to pretend to read the secret counsels of the Most High in order to understand the plain lessons which it brings home to us. It did not come causeless. It had its source, not in the maddened brain of a single warlord or the ambitions of a dominating caste in a single country. These were but the obvious outlets of a deeper, darker pool of ungodliness, of pride and presumption, of greed and self-seeking and mammon-worship, of which no nation is guiltless and no heart is wholly clean. To say that the sole reason of the war was to punish men for their sins, or that it will end only when they repent and are converted, is to speak unwisely and without due warrant. To say that it is the Divine will, declared unmistakably in His sore judgments, that men should sincerely repent and turn unto God, and that only so will they reap the rewards of righteousness and win the higher spiritual plane on which He would have them dwell, is to speak in truth and soberness. It is the lesson that we need to learn in the nation, in the Church, in the community or congregation, and in our individual souls.

The lesson is all the harder to learn because we are so well satisfied with the justice of our cause, the purity of our motives, the unselfishness of our sacrifices. But the permanent fruit of all these will only be ours as we are spiritually able to grasp and to hold it. If the old sins which in the last analysis brought about the war shall pass through it unrebuked and undestroyed, they will devour the fruits of victory and destroy the good that was gained. Because of the just cause God has given us to defend, because of the noble sacrifices He enables us to make, because of the high ends for which we strive and the happy results which we hope to reap in truer ideals and higher standards of living, let us the more sincerely repent us of our sins and amend our ways, social and personal; dragging to light and putting to death those hidden lusts and secret disloyalties which war in our members and in the body politic. It is only so that a real, because spiritual, victory shall be ours.

A recent tractate by Canon E. A. Burroughs, of England (The Delayed Decision; Longmans, Green & Co., 10 cents) is pessimistic in tone because the writer detects a sad lack of heart-searching penitence and humility in the attitude of the English people. He lays the blame largely upon the government, which, he claims, has encouraged the opposite tendency of self-assurance and national pride. As a result there has come about a disquieting feeling of doubt and scepticism as to war news and war aims, a spirit of unreality pervading speech and thought. "It is the natural retribution," he says,

"upon cheap and reckless optimism, itself inspired by the official view that the one thing needful is to keep the country cheerful at all costs, and that to be pleased with ourselves is the surest way to win." This view, he declares, "is based on a false psychology, a false view of how human nature works." And again, "It is lack of conscience that impairs efficiency, reduces output, saps enthusiasm, and so prolongs the war. And conscience is only another name for the sense and the fear of God. . . . It would have 'paid' materially to have reformed spiritually. And what is more important, it would have left us ready to make the best use of peace, instead of having to think, as we now do, of the after-war period with sinking hearts."

It is but fair to say that in a post-script, added during the month of January last, the author notes a decided "turn in the tide," both in the tone of official deliverances and in the attitude of the people as shown in their response to the National Day of Prayer. But here are his words, looking to the future, to which we wished to call attention:

"We have this thought to inspire and compel us that, whatever may happen with regard to the end of the war, the hope of a new and better world after it rests with the men and the women in all nations who believe in God and will act accordingly. 'True religion,' says 'A Student in Arms,' 'is betting your life that there's a God.' And that is the very heart of Christianity. That is the secret of the abolition of self, which is the fruit of the Spirit of Christ in a life. It is only a great wave of selflessness, passing through the whole community, that can make after-war reconstruction possible; and I challenge any man to show me whence we can get it except from Christ Himself."

"We stand face to face with a situation not unlike that in which London found itself in the year 1666, when, after the great fire, it became necessary to plan a new London for the future. It is on record that Sir Christopher Wren presented to the then authorities a comprehensive scheme of reconstruction, to centre in the new St. Paul's Cathedral, from which broad, convenient thoroughfares would radiate in all directions. The plans were accepted; but it proved impossible to carry them out, to the great loss of London to this day. Why? Because the individual citizens of those days insisted on having their own little houses on their own little plots built up exactly as they had been before. Self arose and spoiled the future; and so the old London, with its crookedness and its narrowness, is with us still. And for us today the question is, Shall the new world after the war perpetuate the crookedness and narrowness of the pre-war world? or shall it be a world intersected with broad ways of righteousness and truth, converging upon, and radiating from, their one true source and centre—the living worship of the living God? It is only the Christians of the world who can secure that this ideal is realized—by being Christians, that is, reformers and fighters by God's side, and never resting till the Christian law and spirit prevail."

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

I. The Great Need.

Many thoughtful people have long felt that there is need of a better system by which clergy of the Church may be transferred easily from one parochial cure to another. The changed conditions of our modern life seem to make worse the difficulty of former years. As expressed in the Living Church Annual for the year 1916 (page 9).

"Our 'system' of bringing clergy into touch with parish work is simply atrocious." * * * "We almost compel them to become 'office-seekers,' and then we despise them when they have done so." And again, it is there said: "We need more clergy, although we also need much more, to find the better way to utilize those we have." This is an important statement, for one way to obtain the "more clergy" that are needed will be to better utilize those we have.

Mr. James A. Waterworth, of St. Louis, in a report on missionary work at the Provincial Synod of the Southwest in January, 1914, said: "It is, we think, generally conceded that the present system of allotment of cures, tenure of office and remuneration of our mission clergy is far from satisfactory. The work is not evenly distributed, the stipend is generally inadequate, payment is not always prompt, the continuance is not guaranteed, and the field is not covered." As a result of these unsatisfactory conditions, he further says: "Our mission clergy pass in sad procession through one Diocese to another in their effort to better living conditions, without a long enough stay in any one field to become acquainted with the work, the people or with their brother clergy. The system, or lack of system, which permits such conditions to exist cannot be right, nor favorable to the work of the Church. It certainly is not good business." (See Spirit of Missions for May, 1914, page 330.)

As the results of this lack of proper system, two things may be noted: First, long lists of non-parochial clergy, some of whom (not all) are capable of doing active work; and, secondly, large numbers of vacant parishes and missions. Clergy, in some cases, resort to secular, or semi-secular work; and the long continued vacancy in parishes and missions becomes harmful. People become cold and indifferent, the flock is not fed, children are not adequately instructed, many wander away and are lost to us entirely. There is a distinct loss to the clergy; and there is also a very serious loss to the people.

In strong parishes in the larger cities people do not realize these conditions. They are able to pay a reasonable salary to their clergy, and changes with them are not so frequent. It is in the smaller and weaker parishes and in many mission stations that the trouble lies. In smaller towns, and in country places, there are difficulties not often found in the larger cities.

While our present parish system has its defects, even for strong parishes, and in large cities, the chief defects and difficulties are in the smaller parishes and in mission stations.

The difficulty is not in a dearth of clergy, for there are many qualified clergy seeking employment. Neither is there a lack of means, for our people have sufficient means; but it is a lack of a proper system, of bringing the work and the workers together.

There are difficulties; but they are not insurmountable, though perhaps not well understood. These difficulties can be met, they should be met, and should be overcome.

A CHILDREN'S SERVICE OF INTER-SESSION.

Permit me to tell your thoughtful readers, that they may "go and do likewise," of a most wonderful weekly service for the children of all denominations, inaugurated in a small town in old Virginia by a beloved minister of the Episcopal Church.

At 10 A. M. every Friday these children of all degrees assemble at the Red Cross rooms, Girl Scouts, Boy Scouts in uniform, little ones of all ages, form in marching order and go directly to the church, led by a spirited boy with a white banner containing on both sides the words, "Come and pray with us for our soldiers" (our minister, almost unseen, directs it all), singing as they go to file and drum, "Onward, Christian Soldiers." The United States flag is foremost, but the flags of all our Allies are present. Even babies in their mothers' arms are carried and the body of the church is filled. A few words of instruction and warning, short, direct prayers for Army, Navy and other branches, several hymns and close with the singing of "America."

Well might we "grown-ups" recall the sacred words, "And a little child shall lead them"—such uniform reverence and absolute silence as these yet pure young hearts go up to God in pleading for our men, our women and the Cause of Right.

"Ask what ye will in My name and I will do it."

A LOVER OF THE PURE IN HEART AND A BELIEVER IN PRAYER.

ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY OF THE EDUCATION SOCIETY OF VIRGINIA.

Historical Address Delivered at the Theological Seminary in Virginia, June 6, 1918, by Mr. J. Holdsworth Gordon.

The year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen—the year of our Lord, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen. One hundred years. As we pause to contemplate we are awed with the length of time represented, as compared with the average span of human life. And how fraught it has been with great events.

One hundred years ago this land of ours was a young and almost untried country. Its population numbered but a few millions. Its position in the family of nations was unimportant. Its life was problematical and its form of government as yet an experiment. During that period we have been involved in wars, domestic and foreign, but the Republic still lives, while dynasties have fallen and thrones have tottered. Our population has increased until today we have passed the hundred millions. Our flag is recognized and honored as the emblem of one of the great powers of the world. We have been blessed, truly blessed of God, and we may thankfully rejoice in the fact that we have been, through Divine Providence, permitted to be a Christian country, for without the love of God, and His Guiding Hand, and the power and influence of the teachings of His Dear Son, no country could have truly prospered as has ours. Today our sons with patriotic hearts are taking their parts in the world struggle for the vin-dication of civilization, virtue, liberty and Christian morality, against inhuman autocracy, cruelty and brutal savagery, and may we not firmly believe that the most potential influence exercised in our land to make our people what they are today, may be in a large measure attributed to the teachings of those institutions where true Christian virtue, honor and integrity have been and are still being disseminated? And surely no one can stand higher, no one can present a purer, fairer or more worthy record than the Society to celebrate the Centennial of which we have, with proud but reverent hearts, gathered here today, "The Society for the Education of Pious Young Men for the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church" and its offspring, the "Protestant Episcopal Theological Seminary in Virginia."

No doubt the question has arisen in the minds of more than one of those present, "Why is it that an outsider is paying tribute to our beloved institution and not one from our immediate midst?" It is a natural question, but one fortunately easily answered. He who addresses you comes from Christ Church Parish, Georgetown, D. C., a parish that had its birth almost simultaneously with the Education Society. Its people were from the very beginning amongst the most earnest laborers for its welfare. They were its supporters with heart and hand. In its earlier days the closest and most loving relations existed between our parish and this organization. One of its first and most revered instructors was the first rector of Christ Church, and amongst the most zealous laborers for its foundation on a firm basis are found the names of the officers of our parish. Our pulpit has been filled by many of her honored sons, and we have in times of need felt at liberty to call on her professors and officers to aid us in the services of our sanctuary. And our call has always met with a speedy and loving response. So that while there could be found many far more capable of doing justice to the theme, no one could be found bringing a more loyal heart, or with mind and spirit more hallowed by loving associations, memories and traditions.

The special duty assigned to me today is to speak of the origin and early history of the Society.

It has been a pleasing labor to delve into the past and mark the growth of this grand institution. Like all of its kind its birth was amid difficulties and adverse surroundings that were apparently insurmountable. And yet under the Guiding Hand of Him to Whose service it was dedicated, and in Whose work it has ever labored, it has safely ridden over the waves and through the storms that threatened it.

As is well known to students of its history, our branch of the Church of God was at a low ebb in this part of the world one hundred years ago. So low that its condition filled the hearts of all true churchmen with sorrow and forebodings. There was but little religious fervor evinced, especially amongst the young men, and the real workers in the field, though of Godly character and fervent in spirit, were but few.

Our youth were not coming forward to offer themselves for the work of their Master, and there was no place near at hand to receive them, in which the training and instruction necessary for the performance of the duties of the position to be assumed could be given, even should they present themselves. These conditions were a source of abiding sorrow and concern to those having at heart the welfare of the Church and the spread of the Father's Kingdom. Indeed the story of the Church in Virginia and the adjacent States at that time was a sad one and her condition appalling.

One of our most revered Bishops, writing on the subject, says: "It seemed as if the worst hopes of her enemies and the most painful fears of her friends were about to be realized in her entire destruction."

A short time before, in the year 1811, the following minute had been entered on the journal of the General Convention of the Church held at New Haven:

"They fear, indeed, that the Church in Virginia is from various causes so depressed that there is danger of her total ruin, unless great exertions, favored by the blessing of Providence, are employed to raise her."

When we look to our Church today, in its beauty, its simplicity, its power for good, and as we turn to our clergy, a band of noble workers in the vineyard, earnest in the faith, unselfish, conscientious and loving in their labors, we can indeed echo the sentiment of another, that "God must have greatly loved this branch of His Holy Catholic Church to have guided her through such adverse storms and established her on so firm a basis."

It was out of the religious necessities of the times that this Society grew. We find that as far back as 1815 Dr. John Augustine Smith, President of William and Mary College, had urged that there be established at that seat of learning a Theological Chair. Some years later his suggestion took form, and an amount deemed sufficient to support the Chair having been secured, a professor was invited to assume its duties. And here began the participation of the parish from which I come in the movement for the establishment of a Theological School, that finally resulted in the existence of this institution.

In November, 1817, Christ Church Parish, Georgetown, D. C., was organized. After much deliberation and careful survey of the field the rector selected to lead the new parish was the Rev. Reuel Keith. As showing the very high esteem in which Mr. Keith was held, I quote from the letter of the vestry calling him to the rectorship. This letter is found amongst the records of our parish, is dated December, 1817:

"The most prominent, important and interesting duty devolved on us is the selection of a minister in whose devotion to the religion of Christ, and the doctrines and forms of the Episcopal Church, the utmost confidence can be placed. We are very happy in assuring you that we have reason to expect from you a conscientious discharge of the duties attached to the ministerial character, and therefore take unfeigned pleasure in asking you to take charge of the congregation."

I read the above to show the very high esteem in which Mr. Keith was held as a churchman, a man of undoubted devotion to the religion of Christ and loyal to the doctrines and ritual of our own Church. Mr. Keith accepted the call thus made and continued in charge of the parish until January, 1820, when he was called to take the Theological Chair at William and Mary College. Our minutes also contain the letter addressed by the rector on his retirement to accept the duties he was to assume. This letter shows the pious and fervent character of the man selected for the chair as well as his loving and affectionate disposition. The letter bears date January 20, 1820, and in it the writer says:

"It is with emotions more painful than I can recollect to have felt on any occasion that I sit down to communicate to you the determination of my mind respecting the Williamsburgh professorship. With my present situation I have ever been and am still not merely pleased, but highly delighted. My prospect of usefulness is certainly all that could be reasonably expected in any congregation. . . . No town that I have ever seen appeals to me preferably, as a place of residence, to this healthy, beautiful and flourishing city. The tokens of friendship and affection which I have received from that portion of its inhabitants which constitute the congregation of Christ Church are such as I despair of ever experiencing from any other people. The thought, therefore, of separating from a people for whom I cherish a devoted attachment (the full force of which I never felt till now), for whose eternal welfare I have through the grace of God long felt the deepest concern: with whom I confidently hoped to close my labors, and to finish my course on earth, is inexpressibly distressing. But after having three times positively declined leaving here, at length in defiance of the influence of my attachment to my congregation, over the decision of my understanding and wholly against my will, I am brought to the conclusion that it is my indispensable duty to go. I cannot but consider the situation of William and Mary College in connection with the state of religion in Virginia and the adjacent States, such as to render me altogether inexcusable before God, were I to decline the invitation given me to become one of its officers."

Could anything evince more clearly the true nobility of the man than the words just read? Comfort, loving and loved surroundings; all that could contribute to human happiness, cast aside and counted as nothing worth at the call of duty. A duty entailing hard labor, mental anguish and promising disheartening disappointments. Of such mould was Reuel Keith. Following the minute recording the acceptance of Mr. Keith's resignation, we find evidence of the deep interest of the parish in the work he was about to undertake, for the following appears:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to form a Society for the education of pious young men for the ministry of the Episcopal Church, ancillary to that now in existence, for the Dioceses of Maryland and Virginia."

We know the result of the Williamsburgh undertaking. It proved an utter failure, and we are told that during the continuance of the chair but one student presented himself.

But let us go back a little. Efforts had been made by those interested in the education of young men for the ministry of our Church, in the various congregations of Virginia and Maryland and District of Columbia, resulting in the form of societies, guilds and other organizations with that object in view, and in the month of June, 1818, the matter crystallized and the "Protestant Episcopal Education Society" was formed. That being the name by which it was usually known.

The preamble to the constitution adopted by the organization recites:

"Whereas, the conventions of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Maryland and Virginia have, by various resolutions, recommended measures for educating young men for the ministry, and,

Whereas, societies have been formed in Baltimore and other places for promoting this laudable object, several clergy and laity from the two dioceses above named met in the city of Washington and resolved themselves into a Society, with a view of imitating their brethren in this zeal and labor of love, and adopted the following constitution.

1. This Society shall be called "The Society for the Education of Pious Young Men for the Ministry of the Protestant Episcopal Church."

The constitution then provided for officers whose duties were to manage the concerns of the Society not otherwise provided for. This constitution was adopted in June, 1818, at Washington, D. C., and it has been repeatedly asserted, though I find no record of the fact, that the meeting at which this organization took place was held in our parish.

The officers named were as follows:
President—Rev. William W. Wilmer.
Vice-President—Rev. Walter D. Addison.

Second Vice-President—Rev. William Hawley.

Secretary—Rev. Enoch Lowe.

Treasurer—C. Page.

Managers—Rev. Oliver Norris, Rev. William Meade, Rev. Edward C. McGuire, Rev. George Lemon, Rev. Reuel Keith, Rev. Charles Mann, Francis S. Key, Daniel Murray, Richard W. West, William A. Knox, Edmund J. Lee, Philip Nelson.

All men of the highest standing in the Councils of the Church and of equal eminence in the communities in which they moved.

For a while the labors of the organization consisted in endeavoring to raise funds and in creating an interest in the work throughout the Church generally. But with the Williamsburgh failure came a new vision, and the urgent necessity for action infused a spirit of renewed life into the members and in the inauguration of active work. But it was no easy matter. Money in those days was not so plentiful as it is now. Those were not the days of millionaires, and while hearts were liberal purses were not long. And yet those having in charge the undertaking were not of the kind to shrink before obstacles or to be awed into inactivity by difficulties, and it was determined to start the school in the city of Alexandria. This was in 1823. The first professors selected were the Rev. Reuel Keith, the Rev. William H. Wilmer and the Rev. Oliver Norris. After results proved the wisdom of these selections.

Objections to the new school arose from various quarters, and it was earnestly urged that the school should not be carried on. However, the work was carried on, and the labors of the institution were prosecuted for several years in the city of Alexandria, with more or less success. Appeals were made to the churchmen of the two Dioceses of Virginia and Maryland, as well as to other Dioceses interested in the work. These appeals met with loving responses and a few years after the beginning of its life in Alexandria the property, upon which the buildings stand in which we are now assembled, was purchased, and the school moved to its new home. From time to time additions were made until today the Theological Seminary stands, in its simplicity, and its beauty, one of the most revered and well-beloved institutions of the State and of the Church at large. With hallowed memories and sanctified traditions—a monument to the tears, the prayers and to the abiding faith and the untiring labors of the truest of men; faithful servants of their God. A noble history, and a story of love, courage and beauty, and an everlasting glory to its founders.

THE GREEN COLUMN.

By Duncan Savage.

Procrastination ought to be classed by the moral philosophers among the sins, not among the foibles, for it buries deep the talents it is our duty to turn to account. How many a life that might have brought satisfaction to oneself and profit to others has never been lived! Thief of time? Procrastination is the destroyer of life, if life is not quantity to be counted by the clock, but faculty to be weighed against performance. Many a man of ability has dreamed and drifted until one day he woke in dismay: "Good God! Can it be that I am forty-five years old and not a thing done of all that I purposed? Not a thing? Not a thing?"

Procrastination theft? Procrastination is suicide! and the little story I offer is a parable of procrastination.

In the good old days when there were no philosophers and therefore no doubters; when men, however much they might trouble others, did not trouble themselves, but took things as they were; when kings had the power of life and death, which the kings enjoyed and the people thought all right, there lived a king who disliked one of his subjects greatly. Glad indeed would he have been to order the man's head taken off, but the fellow was too good, and really his poor Majesty had no chance, for our king, though he lived in the good old days when kings were kings, and while he had no ambition to be called just, did not like to have his people call him a tyrant. How could he manage it? Two weeks he pondered and one day pondering smiled. Straightway a summons was sent to the man to appear before His Majesty next court-day.

The day came, the king was seated on his high judge's throne on one side of the market place, and the man he disliked stood before him.

"Son of your father," said the king, "I have condemned you to death, and now—"

"Copy of God," interrupted the man, "when did Your Irresistibleness condemn me to death, and what did I do, O, Example for the Sun?"

"Never mind," the king answered. "You are condemned to die by the axe, but the sentence will not be executed if within the twelvemonth that begins tomorrow you touch the Green Column here at my side before the shadow cast by the sundial's finger shall have reached the point of noon on the last day of the twelvemonth that begins tomorrow."

When the man heard that he smiled and the king smiled.

Day after day the man's best friend would ask when he was going to touch the Green Column, and the man would answer:

"Oh! some time or other. No hurry; don't worry; there's plenty of time."

The last day of the twelvemonth was come. On the far side of the market-place sat the king high on his throne of judgment on one side of the Green Column; on the other, high on a lofty platform, stood the executioner, axe over shoulder; the square was packed with the people except for half a circle in front of the Green Column and a lane that led to it from the other side of the square; and the traveling shadow on the sundial was only a little way from the point of noon. A din of voices filled the market-place, for all were talking except the king and the executioner who sat and stood as if they were stone.

A shout went up. The good man who gave the king no chance was seen at the far end of the lane running at the top of his speed.

"Hurry! Hurry!" screamed the people.

He touched the Green Column just as the shadow from the sundial's finger darkened the point of noon.

"Yes, if I told him once I told him one hundred times that Some Time or Other is No Time Whatever," were the words his best friend repeated to the end of his life.

"He had no one to blame but himself," said the people.

And the king for several years when at wine would lift his cup and turning a quizzical eye upon his minister, remark: "Hip! Hip! The Day After Tomorrow!"

ST. PAUL'S THIRTIETH ANNIVERSARY.

By William Anthony Aery.

Begun thirty years ago by the Rev. James S. Russell as "a venture of faith without a foot of ground or a dollar," the St. Paul Normal and Industrial School, at Lawrenceville, Va., today merits the praise of those who are experts in the field of vocational education, and commands the support of many thoughtful Christian men and women who put education above ignorance and who see in America's army of twelve million negroes a national asset of untold value.

Archdeacon Russell, who in his own modest, effective way has revolutionized the life of colored people in Brunswick and the neighboring counties, said in a recent report to the trustees:

"Today, instead of three teachers and a half dozen boarders, the St. Paul School has more than fifty officers, instructors and other employees; over five hundred students, more than 4,500 undergraduates, 600 academic and trade graduates, well-trained young men and women working among their people; 1,600 acres of land, twenty-three industrial and school departments, over thirty large and small buildings, and a plant and equipment worth over a quarter of a million dollars."

There has been no falling off in the number of students seeking admission to St. Paul; the attendance of community students for the year exceeded that of any other period.

"The school is doing," said Principal Russell, "a splendid local work in fitting and training young people for spheres of usefulness in the county. Our service in this particular could be greatly augmented, if we had an up-to-date model or practice school for the training of the children of the community. This school would also afford better facilities for giving our own graduates teacher-training. Of the fifty-four teachers in the county, twenty-eight are full graduates of St. Paul's, and twenty others are undergraduates or have received some part of their training at St. Paul's."

"As the school grows, the necessity of some more satisfactory method of financing it becomes apparent. The conditions brought about by the war emphasize the necessity of some more dependable source of income. Donations do not keep pace with the size and importance of this large work. The offerings of the school last year were, however, larger than for the previous year. No amount of pruning or economy can avail to offset the outstanding fact of insufficiency and lack of permanency of income. The school is too large and too important now for hand-to-mouth financing. . . . I feel that we should bend our efforts in the direction of having the school sufficiently endowed so as to provide running expenses. We should not be compelled longer to face the future on such a precarious foundation as voluntary donations principally."

The deficit of the school as of May 1 was at least $25,000.

To those who realize the importance of St. Paul's work in meeting the war-time demands and in preparing students to meet the post-war problems of adjustment, it seems very important that all who can possibly do so should come forward to help relieve Principal Russell of this heavy burden.

With faith and vision and prayer the Founder and Principal of St. Paul's School has always faced his problems. Today he thoroughly believes that broad-minded men and women, when they fully realize the school's influence for good, will furnish St. Paul with ample funds in order to continue the constructive work of training intelligent, self-respecting, self-reliant citizens and Christian leaders who will remake communities.

The school is recognized by the Virginia Department of Education as one of the important centers of negro training. Many of the St. Paul students serve as teachers.

Of the one hundred and thirty colored ministers of the Church, twenty-two have gone from St. Paul's School.

The Great Commission

Mission Receipts.

In his June report, after giving the receipts from the various sources in detail as compared with last year, Mr. King says:

"From these figures it will be seen that so far this year the receipts (totaling $715,676.41) are $55,537.56 less than last year. Individual gifts are over $12,000 greater, and those from the Sunday-schools are $6,800 larger; while the Auxiliaries are $8,900 less. But the real trouble lies with parish offerings, and it is concerning these we wish to say a word.

"We feel that a reason for this condition probably is because of the change of date of the fiscal year from November 1 to January 1. Many parishes will now no doubt make their final efforts in the late autumn instead of in the spring as heretofore. This will be most unfortunate for the Board's work.

"Another reason undoubtedly was the nation's call in May for subscriptions to the Liberty Loan, and for donations to the Red Cross needs. Thank God both were so nobly met. But the Church's need is just as vital, just as grave. The present situation is disquieting. Last year the apportionment fell short of being paid in full by $154,000. This sum needs to be returned this year, and a fully paid up apportionment as well. Will not the reverend Clergy bring these matters to the attention of their congregations.

"George Gordon King,
"Treasurer."

Church Missions House, June 1, 1918.

The English Church Missionary Society has just closed its fiscal year with receipts of $2,035,000, not including special funds. This is the "largest ordinary income the society has ever received." The society was able to meet all its obligations for the year with a surplus of $1,500.

The Rev. C. C. B. Bardsley, D. D., Secretary of the Church Missionary Society, writing about the responsibility of the Church Missionary Society to the government in what he calls "these fate laden days" declares:

"We must retain with intensity the conviction that the greatest contribution of the Church to the nation is through helping to strengthen all the spiritual forces in her life. The morale of the nation depends upon her attitude towards God.

"The spirit in which the Church responds to the call," Dr. Bardsley continues, "will largely determine her influence in the nation. Her sacrifices must be neither tardy nor niggardly. Fresh and different sacrifices are required.

"It is seen again that we are fighting for freedom and truth, which are the ideals of the Kingdom of God; in days when the clouds are heavy, the rays of a new hope are breaking through, as all side issues and secondary aims recede into the background and great ideals once more stand out clear-cut and challenging. The war-spirit must be cleansed and quickened by the true passion for righteousness and brotherhood. The sacrifice which must be made must be a spiritual sacrifice. It must be made by men and women who are aflame with devotion to God and His cause, and whose action is the answer to their own prayer, 'Thy Kingdom come.' The Church that is scattered abroad must be living and witnessing."

One of the significant features of Dr. Bardsley's statement is that it nowhere suggests contraction or postponement in the Church's missionary work in these days of war, but rather calls upon the people of the Church of England to meet extraordinary emergencies and requirements by extraordinary sacrifices made in a spirit of loyal devotion to God and to the nation.

Bishop F. R. Graves, of Shanghai, China, has completed twenty-five years of service as a Bishop of the Church in the Far East. In 1893, the year in which he was consecrated, the Church was established in the city of Shanghai, and there were some outstations around it, but none at which a foreign missionary resided. The next stations where our missionaries were placed were Hankow and Wuchang. We had just got a footing in Ichang, in 1890, and opened an outstation at Shasi when the house was burned in the riots of 1891, and the foreign missionary had to withdraw. The foreign part of the mission staff was a small one, the Chinese Clergy were few and there were no trained catechists or Bible women such as we have now. The original Diocese extended from Ichang to Shanghai, a length of nine hundred miles. This was divided into two by the establishment of the missionary district of Hankow under Bishop Ingle in 1901. In 1910 this Diocese was in its turn divided and the missionary district of Anking set off. All three Dioceses from the China Mission of the American Church, which, together with the five English Dioceses and the one under the care of the Church in Canada, constitute the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui, or Holy Catholic Church in China. The establishment of this national Church is perhaps the greatest advance which Bishop Graves has seen in his twenty-five years of service, and he was to a large extent instrumental in bringing it to pass.

Church Intelligence

The General Synod of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui.

By the Rev. Edmund J. Lee.

The third triennial Synod of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui was held in Shanghai on the seventh to the fourteenth of April. The strange words in this sentence constitute the official name of the Church formed by the union of the eleven Anglican Dioceses in China. Of these, seven are governed by English Bishops, three by Americans, one by a Canadian. As in our own General Convention the Synod consists of a House of Bishops and a House of Delegates. Each Diocese is entitled to a representation of four clergymen and four laymen in the House of Delegates. The maximum attendance in this House would, therefore, have been eighty-eight. The actual attendance, however, was only sixty-four, as several Dioceses were unable to send full delegations, while from the Diocese of West China, in the distant Province of Szechuen, neither the Bishop nor a single delegate were able to get through, owing to the disturbed state of the country.

The meetings of the Synod were held in the fine new library building of St. John's University, which proved admirably adapted for them. The two houses were just across the hall from each other, which greatly facilitated the interchange of messages. As with us, either House can initiate business but both must concur in any action for it to be valid.

The Synod opened with a Corporate Communion service at St. John's Pro-Cathedral, and closed with a great service at the English Cathedral in Shanghai. On the afternoon of the first Sunday a missionary service was held in the new Church of Our Saviour, just completed, in one of the newer parts of rapidly growing Shanghai. This church building is interesting for two reasons. It was an expensive church, but not one penny of the building fund came from foreigners, in fact the Committee definitely refused the offer of a contribution of $500 from a foreign source. The other notable feature is that in the design of the church a very daring adaptation of Chinese architecture has been made. The front of the church looks very much like one of the great gates of Peking. Opinions differ as to the general effect, but personally I think the effort has been a success.

The sessions of the Synod opened on Monday, April the 8th, Bishop Graves was elected chairman of the House of Bishops; the Rev. Dr. Potts, of St. John's University, of the House of Delegates. The fact that the Synod carried through its extensive agenda and closed on time was due in no small degree to the skill and wisdom of the two chairmen.

Among the important matters handled by the Synod was the preparing of canons governing the election of Missionary Bishops, assistant Bishops and the ordination of priests and deacons. The procedure to be followed in the case of candidates for the ministry is much simpler than that of our American Church, being modelled somewhat after the English use.

Another important step taken was the organization of a central Theological Seminary for the whole Anglican Communion in China. It is to be called the Central Theological School of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui, and will be located in Hankow, the most centrally located Diocesan center of the Chinese Church. It will be controlled by a Board of Directors, consisting of the eleven Bishops, the Dean and one additional member from each of the eleven Dioceses. These last are to be elected by each Diocese subject to confirmation by the General Synod or by its Standing Committee. The medium of instruction will be Chinese. It may seem strange to specify this, but most of the theological instruction in our mission is at present done in the English language.

The nucleus of the school will be our own All Saints Divinity School at Hankow, and it is a foregone conclusion, in the judgment of the present writer, that the Dean of the enlarged institution will be the present Dean of the Hankow School, the Rev. Dr. Ridgely.

The organization of this school is really a definite step in advance. Instead of a number of poorly equipped and poorly manned seminaries we shall have one strong institution. The school will further serve as a strong unifying agency, as many of the Clergy of all the Dioceses will pass through it.

There was present at the Synod a delegation representing the Chinese Christians of our Communion in Japan. There have been during the last fifteen years anywhere from three to twelve thousand Chinese students studying in the city of Tokio alone. The Rev. Mr. Elwyn, of the Diocese of Chekiang, and a Chinese priest of the same Diocese have been doing very successful work among them. They have several hundred members, and have two organized congregations. This delegation came seeking recognition and presentation in the General Synod of the Chinese Church. Their request was granted and their status determined by a carefully prepared canon. They are to be allowed a representation by two delegates with a voice, but no vote, in future meetings of the Synod.

Japan was further represented by two Bishops of the Japanese Church, Bishop Bouflower, of South Tokio, and Bishop Tucker, of Kyoto. These gentlemen were received by the Synod in a joint session of the two Houses, at which they presented the fraternal greetings of the Japanese Church, and delivered stimulating and inspiring addresses.

On Wednesday, April 10th, the Synod met in joint session as a Board of Missions. There was present the Rev. Mr. Koh, one of the first two missionaries to be sent by the Board of Missions of the General Synod to the district set apart for its activities, the Province of Shensi. This work is manned entirely by Chinese, and supported entirely by Chinese offerings. It is confined at present to Sian, the ancient capital and one of the most famous cities of China. Mr. Koh made a very interesting address to the Synod narrating the progress of the work. Though they have been in the field only a year and a half the work has already taken root, and shows fine promise.

As in America the budget for the expenses of the mission is raised by apportionment to the individual parishes, with the difference that with us in China the budget decided upon by the General Synod applies for the next three years.

The Synod passed a canon giving the missionary district a representation in future meetings of the Synod. It is thought highly probable that at the next meeting of the Synod a Chinese Bishop will be elected for the district.

The most significant event of the Synod I have reserved for mention to the last. It was the confirmation of the election of a Chinese priest to be assistant Bishop of the Diocese of Chekiang. According to the new canon such elections must be confirmed by the General Synod, and it was in anticipation of this being passed that the Diocese of Chekiang came with a candidate who had been duly elected by their Diocesan Synod. This will be the first case of the elevation of a Chinese to the Episcopate. It will be a notable event, and shows how deep the foundations of the Church in China have been laid.

The Bishop-elect is Archdeacon Sing. He has had an active and fruitful ministry of thirty years in the Diocese, and many of the Clergy and other workers have been his pupils. He is a man of wide experience, of wisdom and saintliness, and is worthy of the high office to which he is called.

Altogether the third meeting of the General Synod has been to us a cause of great encouragement and thankfulness. It indicated perceptible progress in the unifying of the eleven Dioceses with their four missionary societies and many types of Churchmanship into one united Church. The spirit of brotherhood was very apparent. There was not one jarring note struck in any of the sessions. The Chinese delegates took a much larger part in the discussions than in any previous meetings of the Synod, when they were new at the business and more reluctant to speak. Everything indicated that this daughter Church of our Anglican Communion, this plant of our planting, has taken deep root and is developing a vigorous life of its own, which will not for so many years have to look to the Church of the West for government and support.

Closing Exercises of the Bishop Payne Divinity School.

The closing exercises of the fortieth session of the Bishop Payne Divinity School took place in Emmanuel Chapel, at the school, on Thursday, the thirteenth instant. The baccalaureate sermon was preached the previous Sunday by the Ven. Henry Beard Delany, D. D., Archdeacon of the Diocese of North Carolina. The public meeting of the alumni was held on Wednesday evening, an unusual number of enthusiastic alumni being present. The speakers were, for the alumni, the Rev. James K. Satterwhite, of North Carolina, and for the faculty, the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D.

On Thursday morning a service was held by the alumni in memory of the Rev. Thomas Spencer, who forty years ago was appointed by the Trustees of the Theological Seminary in Virginia to be the first teacher in this school, then established as a branch school of that institution. A bronze memorial tablet, the gift of the alumni, was to have been unveiled in the chapel at this meeting. Unfortunately, it did not arrive until after the meeting. This tablet will be a permanent and fitting recognition by the alumni of the foundation work laid by Mr. Spencer during fifteen years of successful teaching in this school. On this occasion an admirable historical address was delivered by Archdeacon Russell, of Lawrenceville, one of three students with which the school opened in 1878. Dr. Russell spoke with deep appreciation of the work done by the school for him and many others.

After this meeting, the Trustees met in Whittle Hall, fourteen members out of sixteen being present. The Board recorded with much feeling the death of the Rt. Rev. A. M. Randolph, D. D., who had been for nearly twenty-six years President of the Board. The Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., was elected President in his place. The report of the principal, Dr. Bryan, was encouraging in all respects, but owing to war conditions the number of students in this, as in all other institutions of higher learning, is unusually small.

The recognition which the school has received by the Bishops of the Church, and especially by the Synods of the Third and Fourth Provinces, shows the school is now generally regarded as the fittest Seminary for training colored candidates for Orders. This is the result of experience, and especially is it the result of the excellent work done by the eighty-three alumni (thirteen of whom have gone to their reward), of this school in twenty-five Dioceses and missionary jurisdictions in which they are laboring, besides one each in the British West Indies, the Bermudas and West Africa. In testimony of the responsible position held by this school, Bishop Lloyd, when on a visit here, shortly after he returned from Africa, expressed the opinion that this Seminary occupied a position of unique advantage, and was a factor of utmost importance in the work of the Church among the negroes, because real advance in Christian civilization depends primarily upon Christian character and this cannot be expected apart from a rightly instructed and spiritually-minded ministry.

The commencement exercises were held on Thursday evening. The address was delivered by Mr. John Stewart Bryan, of Richmond, after which excellent essays were read by Mr. Egerton E. Hall and the Rev. William Norman Harper, M. D., of the graduating class. Diplomas were awarded to the following full graduates: R. Edgar Bunn, of the Diocese of North Carolina; Egerton E. Hall, of the Diocese of Lexington, and the Rev. William Norman Harper, M. D., of the Diocese of East Carolina. The degree of Bachelor of Divinity was conferred upon the Rev. John Scott, of the Diocese of Virginia.

Pro-German Propaganda.

Editor of the Southern Churchman:

The following letter from a most honorable and revered priest and rector of the Episcopal Church was received by the Rt. Rev. Alexander, Bishop in charge of the Archdiocese of the Alutian Isles and North America:

"June 14, 1918.

"Rt. Rev. Bishop Alexander.

"My Dear Bishop: I beg permission to call your attention to the two enclosures which I received last night, the same having been forwarded to me from my home address. They were in an envelope with my address typewritten on it, and with nothing more upon the envelope to indicate the name of the sender. The communication being anonymous is, of course, enough to condemn it, even without regard to the contents. I feel it my duty, both as a priest and a friend, to let you know what is being done in this disgraceful manner at the earliest possible moment. Whether the same papers have been sent to all the Clergy of the Episcopal Church or not, I have not had time to ascertain. Trusting my action in thus writing you at once will meet with your approval, and with expressions of my highest regard, I beg to remain,

"Very faithfully yours in Christ, our Lord."

The anonymous articles printed with quotations to which the writer refers are supposed extracts from the writings of Bishop Alexander before the war broke out between the United States and the Teutons, and, indeed, might be the expressions of any Christian Bishop who speaks "the truth in love."

However, a villainous pro-German propaganda, not restricted to any special religious organization in particular, yet more prevalent in the midst of the Russo-Greek Holy Orthodox and sister Catholic churches has been very apparent of late in America.

This propaganda, by means of which the Orthodox Bishop of Canada and Acting Archbishop of North America, Dr. Alexander, is basely slandered and held up to reproach before the allies, is unprecedented from a Christian standpoint. However, we have within the Orthodox Church a class of unprincipled men who are purely Bolsheviki, and are hand in hand with Trotzky (the Jew) and Lenine, who, under the guise of patriotism are striving to hoodwink the allies, yet are, in fact, the murderers of our brothers who are being sent to Flanders and over sea for the sake of humanity. If Russia had held firmly her ground the war, perhaps, would have been well-nigh over by this time, but men like the anonymous slanderer to whom I refer, prefer not to have it so. Such unfortunate creatures who have been insidiously slandering Bishop Alexander are of the Bolsheviki type in North America.

Perhaps, for the sake of the Episcopate, irrespective of denomination, and surely as a respecter of the Mother Church of Christendom, you will kindly publish this letter in full, which I have sent by current mail to some other weekly publications of the revered Anglican Communion.

Respectfully,
Ingram N. W. Irvine,
Secretary of the Association of the Citizen Clergy, etc.
New York, June 21, 1918.

Prize Essay Contest.

Through the kindness of a friend, the Joint Commission on Social Service is enabled to offer a prize of $75 for the best essay on the relation of the rural parish to the country community by any clergyman of the Episcopal Church who has done, or is doing, active work in the field. The essays should be written on one of the two following general subjects:

I. A program for the rural community (based upon your own local conditions.)

II. A special report on a phase of rural social service in which you have been or are now particularly interested, either in view of the above or independently.

Inquiries may be addressed to the Commission's office, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

To the Clergy of the Diocese of Virginia.

At the request of the Council of Defense of Virginia, I am asking you to preach a sermon on June 30 appropriate to the celebration of July 4 under present war conditions. Patriotism and religion are nearer together just now than for many years previous. If all our Clergy will speak on the same day upon the subject of the war in connection with religion, I believe that a great good will be accomplished.

Yours faithfully,
ROBERT A. GIBSON,
Bishop of Virginia.

The Rev. William R. Geiger Irwin, rector of St. Peter's Church, Ellicott City, Md., has accepted a call to become assistant minister at St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, the Rev. J. Francis Ribble, D. D., rector, and takes up his new work on July 1. His address will be 225 South Cherry Street, Richmond.

The Rev. Charles W. Sydnor has resigned the rectorship of Christ Church, Richmond, to take effect July 1, at which time Mr. Sydnor will enter war service with the Y. M. C. A.

The Rt. Rev. E. A. Temple, D. D., Bishop of North Texas, visited St. George's Church, Fredericksburg, on Sunday, June 16, and confirmed a class for Bishop Gibson.

The Music Committee of the City Missionary Society, Mr. J. P. Dashiell, Chairman, was ready with singers at the service at the Protestant Episcopal Ladies' Home last Sunday, and the singing added greatly to the enjoyment of the service. There were several guests present.

The Soldiers', Sailors' and Marine Club: In a quiet and unobtrusive way, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in Richmond is engaged in a noble effort to contribute to the comfort and pleasure of our men in uniform by conducting the Soldiers', Sailors' and Marine Club at No. 505 East Grace Street.

The government uniform is the badge of admission, and many take advantage of the quiet, restful rooms to pass their time in writing letters, reading or playing games. At night, comfortable iron beds with soft mattresses offer an inviting place for tired nature's sweet restorer, and in the morning free baths.

In addition to caring for our soldiers, sailors and marines, the club is used by the Clericus, also special meetings of the Diocesan Missionary Society; in fact, the club can be looked upon as a Church Home, where all meetings can have the use of the spacious rooms at the call of the Bishops.

Recently a very pleasant gathering of warm friends assembled around the banquet board to bid farewell to Mr. W. A. James, President of the local Assembly, who has accepted a position in the Y. M. C. A., work at Camp Sevier, Greenville, S. C. A royal send-off was given him, and many expressions of encouragement for the noble work he has undertaken. The various Brotherhoods presented him with tokens of friendly appreciation, for his energy and faithful work. Mr. T. Crawford Redd was chosen President to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Mr. James.

Through the untiring efforts of Colonel Henry Lee Valentine, Chairman of the Officers' Board, a fire escape has been added to the building to insure the safety of guests.

NORTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Jos. B. Cheshire, D. D., Bishop.

Grace Church, Weldon, the Rev. N. C. Duncan, rector, had a most interesting Sunday-school Conference, June 18 to 22, conducted by the Rev. Warren W. Way, of Salisbury. Mr. Way is Chairman of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education. Delegates, including the rectors from adjoining parishes met at this convenient center to study principles and methods of Sunday-school work, and to profit by the exchange of experiences in informal conferences.

No more helpful, inspiring addresses will be heard in any conference than those given by Mr. Way at the morning sessions, and the open discussions were practical and valuable.

The evening sessions were devoted to sermons preached by the visiting clergymen, and were all of high order and an inspiration to those who heard them. The morning sessions were well attended by teachers, and the evening services were attended by practically the whole congregation.

DELAWARE.

Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. F. M. Kirkus, rector of Trinity Church, Wilmington, for reasons of a private nature, has been compelled to take a four months' vacation. He has been granted a six months' leave of absence by the vestry, and will spend the summer at Eaglesmere, Pa., where he will take charge of the church there until September 1. During his absence the Rev. Charles W. Clash will have charge of Trinity Church, the Rev. Thomas V. Wingate assisting.

CENTRAL NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. C. T. Olmstead, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Standing Committee of the Diocese of Central New York has organized by the election of the Rev. Edward H. Coley, D. D., of Utica, as President, and the Rev. James K. Parker, of Waterville, as Secretary.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

Mobile is to have a campaign for missions and a city-wide Every Member Canvass in October. The Rev. Louis G. Wood, Field Secretary of the Board of Missions, has just concluded a week's visit here, preaching in each of the city and suburban churches and holding conferences with the Clergy and vestrymen. The tangible result has been the above determination. At the joint meeting of the vestries there was much enthusiasm, and the resolution was passed unanimously to proceed immediately with organization for the campaign.

The Rev. Mr. Wood's counsel was the more weighty because of his work in All Saints' Church, the Rev. James F. Plummer rector, two years ago, when this campaign was held in that parish alone, under his leadership, with very happy results.

ATLANTA.

Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Captain H. L. Jewett Williams.

A shadow of gloom has been cast over the Diocese by the news of the death of the Rev. H. L. Jewett Williams. Captain Williams was in the ministry of the Church and was serving as professor of New Testament Greek in the Theological Department at the University of Sewanee when war was declared. After consultation with his Bishop, he entered the Officers' Training Camp at Fort McPherson. At the end of his training, he was commissioned as a captain of infantry. He went to France with the Eighty-second Division. It was a great shock when news of his death in battle came on June 15.

Captain Williams was a graduate of the University of Georgia and of the Theological Department of the University of Sewanee. He was a clean, strong, magnetic and noble character, and much beloved by all who knew him. He felt it his duty to enter the service of his country as a soldier; that he could do more good as an officer than as a chaplain. His intention was to re-enter the active ministry after the war.

Captain Williams was in the first years of his ministry rector of St. Stephen's Church, Milledgeville, in this Diocese, and was a canonical resident of this Diocese while professor in Sewanee University.

The commencement sermon at the University of Georgia was preached by Bishop Mikell, of Atlanta, and in his sermon he took occasion to pay a tribute to the splendid soldier and minister, Captain Williams.

Bishop Mikell Visits Camp Wheeler.

The Bishop of Atlanta has just made a most successful visitation of two days at Camp Wheeler. He was the guest of Horace R. Chase, Camp Secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and the Rev. Robb White, Jr., chaplain of the One Hundred and Eighteenth Field Artillery, United States Army. The first day of his time was taken up chiefly in visiting different parts of the camp. He went through the base hospital and talked with many of the patients and gave them words of comfort. Supper was taken with officers of the One Hundred and Twenty-first Infantry, after which he went to the stockade and spoke to the prisoners, returning to Y. M. C. A. Building No. 47, where he addressed a well-filled house of soldiers. Immediately following this he attended a reception given by the officers and the wives of the One Hundred and Twenty-first Regiment. Thursday was also a very busy day, commencing with an early celebration of Holy Communion at the base hospital. A conference was held with the Clergy of the city of Macon as to the very best means of carrying on the religious work of the camp among the soldiers. Various opinions were expressed, but with the suggestions made it was left to the Civilian and Camp Secretary to work out a definite plan. A dinner was given the Bishop by the officers of the One Hundred and Twenty-fourth Infantry. In the afternoon the One Hundred and Eighteenth Field Artillery had a tea, served by the wives of the officers, at which the Bishop was guest. Supper was taken at the headquarters of the Y. M. C. A., followed by a religious service in "Y" Building, No. 44. At this service the Bishop made the principal talk. His words were full of the burning thoughts of the day, and he was listened to by a large number of the boys from the camp. They showed their interest and approval by the closest attention. There is no doubt but that the visit of the Bishop at this time will result in much good. His talks are always full of abundant thought and study.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The quarterly meeting of the Diocesan Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew was held on Commodore Jahncke's yacht "Reverie" on Lake Pontchartrain, on Thursday evening, June 20. After dinner a short business session was held, and the address of the evening was made by the Rev. W. B. Capers, D. D., who will have charge of Trinity Church, New Orleans, during the rector's absence in France.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Memorial Service for the Late Rev. Pelham St. G. Bissell, M. A.

The memorial service for the late rector of Grace Church, Van Vorst, Jersey City, was held in the parish church on Sunday afternoon, June 9. The Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., presided, and was assisted by the present rector, the Rev. Henry B. Bryan, the Rev. Claudius M. Roome, the Rev. Dr. Butterworth and the Rev. D. T. Weidner. The service was attended by the wardens and vestrymen and all the Guilds and organizations of the parish. Seats were reserved for the widow and family of the late rector and representatives of Mr. Bissell's class at Columbia University. Bishop Lines spoke beautifully of the Rev. Mr. Bissell's work. The Rev. Mr. Roome spoke tenderly of his early association with Mr. Bissell, especially while they were classmates at Columbia. Three men in that class, after graduation, found themselves together in the priesthood of the Church, although none of them, while in college, expected to be called into the ministry. Canon Bryan spoke feelingly of the late rector as friend and brother priest. For ten years they had worked side by side, first on Long Island, and subsequently in Grace Church, and during these years nothing ever occurred to mar that friendship. A letter from the Rev. F. E. Mortimer, rector of St. Mark's Church, Jersey City, was read, in which he emphasized the character of Mr. Bissell's ministry, as showing great love for souls, as evinced by the large confirmation classes presented by him, and his loving ministry to the sick and dying.

ERIE.

Rt. Rev. Rogers Israel, D. D., Bishop.

Cathedral Notes.

Bishop Israel's Work in France: The Dean has received the following letter from Dr. Watson, who for many years has been rector of Trinity Church, Paris, and has lately returned to this country:

"I am sending you this hasty note to tell you the news of Bishop Israel. He is well and doing the work of a great apostle. His personal service to the cause of the allies is worth that of a whole regiment of men. Your Diocese can give nothing finer than the service its Bishop is rendering to the boys in France."

Bishop Whitehead, of Pittsburgh, acting for Bishop Israel, held a confirmation service for the churches of Erie at the Cathedral on the evening of May 29. The Bishop's chair was placed near the chancel steps and the different Clergy presented their candidates in turn. Then the Bishop entered the sanctuary and each class was confirmed. The Bishop spoke beautifully of Bishop Israel, to whom he had been a spiritual father; and of the pride the Diocese should take in his work in France. There was a large congregation present and the service was a very hearty one. This was the second class presented by Trinity Church; and the third class presented by the Cathedral within the year.

The Memorial Day service at the Cathedral was joined in by all the churches. The different Clergy of the city took part; Bishop Whitehead read the Litany and special prayers; and Mr. Thomas C. Miller, an attorney of Erie, gave an excellent patriotic address. Thus, as the Bishop said, the Church gladly showed its obedience to the civil authority.

The Rev. James Mills, minor canon of the Cathedral, was married to Miss Hilda Lomax, of Philadelphia, a senior of Wellesley College, in the Cathedral of St. Paul, Boston, on June 14, by Dean Rousmaniere.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

An Educational Campaign.

All Saints' Church, Pittsburgh, the Rev. Floyd Tomkins, Jr., rector, has been holding a series of parish conferences to consider the objectives of the Christian army, of which that parish is a unit. The meetings were in preparation for a "drive," commonly known as an "Every Member Canvass," and were planned on the theory that a successful attack requires a knowledge on the part of the privates (as well as of the officers) of (1) the points to be attacked, (2) the character of the territory over which the attack is to be made, and (3) the methods to be employed.

The objectives were studied under three heads on three successive evenings: The Neighborhood, The Diocese and The Whole World.

The first conference was opened by Miss Bailie, the organizer and manager of the Business Women's Lunch in Trinity Parish House, which feeds nine hundred daily, on the general subject of a parish's responsibility to its neighborhood. The other addresses were by people already engaged in welfare work close to All Saints: Mr. Eliot, of the Woods Run Settlement; Chaplain Miller, of the Western Penitentiary; Mrs. Newheart, of St. John's Hospital; Mrs. Claney, of the city's Child Welfare Department, and Mr. Gilling, the commissioner of the Boy Scouts in the city. These showed very clearly and convincingly what strongholds of the enemy were already under attack, and where Christian reinforcements were needed.

The same line was followed on the next evening, when the subject was the Diocese. The Rev. Dr. H. A. Flint, chairman of the Convention's committee on the subject, showed the great need of an intelligent offensive on behalf of the rural portions of the Diocese which our Church is leaving to the control of the enemy. Brother Gouveneur, for St. Barnabas' Home; Miss Coulson, for the Church Home; the Rev. Mr. Johnson, for St. Margaret's Hospital; and Mr. Shoemaker, for the Laymen's Missionary League, told in turn what is already being done by these Diocesan institutions.

The third evening was devoted to the world-objective, under the able leadership of Mrs. M. C. Adams, Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary. Missionary strategy was considered, and the sectors most open to successful attack, and the method of supplying the troops in the field.

This broad and yet concrete survey of the field of battle was most stimulating, and all concerned expressed their satisfaction at the new vision of the unity of the Church's strategy that they had gained.

Grace Church, Pittsburgh: Sunday morning, June 16th, a large gathering of men assembled at the early celebration of the Holy Communion, in connection with the rector's fifth anniversary, the Rev. William Porkess. At the later morning service the rector preached a special sermon, dwelling upon the marks of progress, covering the five years.

Historical Society: The June meeting of the Diocesan Historical Society was held in St. Andrew's parish, Pittsburgh, on Monday evening, June 10. There was a very good attendance of members and their friends. The Rev. Dr. J. H. McCandless, who has spent a long ministry in Western Pennsylvania, gave a sketch of the first All Saints Church, Pittsburgh. He also gave a brief history of the Mission churches organized early in the Diocesan life at Eldred, Mt. Jewett, Port Alleghany and Kane, all four of them now being situated in the Diocese of Erie. Colonel E. V. D. Selden, of Oil City, read a biographical sketch of his great uncle, the Rev. Samuel West Selden, who served in Beaver County in the early thirties, and of the Rev. William Adderly, who succeeded Mr. Selden in that section; also an account of the Rev. Samuel Earp.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. Dr. Holden to Spend July and August in This Country.

The Rev. Dr. J. Stuart Holden, rector of St. Paul's Church, Portman Square, London, editor of "The Christian," and one of the prominent leaders of the evangelistic forces of England, is to spend July and August in this country. He brings a message from the Christian workers of Great Britain, is understood to be desirous that Christian missions make efforts to solve Russia's problem while the Allies make the same to help that country's political welfare, and wants to carry back home with him American and Canadian counsel on Christian work the moment the war ends. He is to preach on the first Sunday in July in Trinity Church, Boston, on the second and last Sundays in that month in St. James Church, the Rev. Dr. Frank W. Crowder, rector, and St. Paul's Chapel of Columbia University, New York, and on the third Sunday of the month in Chicago. He will preach at the morning service on the dates named in St. James, and the afternoon one at St. Paul's Chapel. The Rev. Dr. Holden has been in America before, preaching in the cities named and teaching at the Northfield Conferences. He was the summer preacher at St. Bartholomew's, New York, when the German Kaiser precipitated the war in 1914, but broke his appointments and sailed for home once, saying that at such time he must be with his own people in Portman Square. He succeeded the late R. C. Morgan as editor of the well-known London weekly.

ALBANY.

Rt. Rev. R. H. Nelson, D. D., Bishop.

St. Faith's School.

The twenty-eighth commencement of St. Faith's School, Saratoga Springs, N. Y., was celebrated during the week beginning June 8.

There were three graduates: Dorothy

A. Plum, of Saratoga Springs; Dorothy E. Silcocks, of Green Island, and Martha I. Wallberg, of Saratoga Springs. The commencement speaker was the Rev. Eugene S. Pearce, of Rome. The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by the Rev. Irving G. Rouillard, of Bethesda Church, Saratoga.

The most significant feature of the week was the laying of the cornerstone of Shackelford Hall—a new dormitory and recreation hall, the building of which was necessitated by the steady growth of the school. Ex-Senator Brackett, of Saratoga Springs, made a strong address on this occasion.

The past year has been the most prosperous in the history of the school. Sixty pupils have been enrolled and a score of others turned away from lack of room. Application has been made to the Synod of the Province of New York and New Jersey for recognition of the school as a Provincial institution.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

Forty Years in the Ministry: On Sunday, June 16th, the fortieth anniversary was noted of the ordination to the ministry of the missionary, the Rev. D. A. Sanford. This occurred at Milwaukee, Wis., on Sunday, June 16, 1878. Beginning in Wisconsin, his ministry has been largely in the Rocky Mountain region and on the Western prairies. For fifteen years he was a missionary among Indians, for a while among Sioux Indians in South Dakota, but principally among Cheyennes in Oklahoma.

Through the intercession of Mrs. Mary D. Burnham, a deaconess of Central New York, certain Indian prisoners had been turned to the Church and a missionary work was begun among Cheyennes and others in the year 1881. After long neglect, Mr. Sanford took up that work in 1894. In addition to work among older Indians, he visited with regularity seven government schools for Indian children, and two United States military posts. In 1904 he founded the Whirlwind Mission School, and besides did work among white people. His work in Oklahoma and elsewhere has been among a great variety of people. In baptisms and other official acts, five Indian tribes have been reached, and including present work among the coal mining districts, among Greeks, Syrians, Koreans and others—fully twenty nationalities and races have been touched during a ministry of forty years.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

Junior Auxiliary.

The annual meeting of the Diocesan branch of the Junior Auxiliary was held at St. Andrew's Church, Fort Worth, St. Barnabas' Day, June 11. In the absence of Bishop Moore, who arrived later in the day, the Rev. E. H. Eckel, rector of the parish, celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. F. T. Datson, rector of Trinity parish, Fort Worth. The three clergymen named gave short missionary talks in the course of the day's program. Miss Martha Russ, of Dallas, Diocesan President, presided. Eight branches responded at roll call, two of which have been organized during the year—Trinity, Fort Worth, and Good Shepherd, Mineral Wells. Interesting reports were made by all branches and by the Diocesan officers. Financial provision was made for transportation to enable the Bishop to use a stereopticon formerly used by one of his Archdeacons. Articles valued at about $90 were reported for a box to be sent to a mission hospital in the Tennessee mountains. Bishop Moore offered a banner, to be known as "The Bishop's Banner," for the Sunday-school making the largest per capita Lenten mite chest offering, beginning next year. In response to his request, it was voted to send a box of hospital supplies to All Saints' Hospital, Fort Worth, next year; and to make a money pledge for the Bishop's discretionary use for the mission at Denton. After luncheon, served in the parish house, and the completion of the afternoon program, the visitors were taken by automobile to the military camps and elsewhere.

St. Andrew's, Fort Worth: Two services were held in St. Andrew's Church, Fort Worth, the Rev. E. H. Eckel, rector, on Memorial Day, when large representations of the Confederate Veterans, Daughters of the Confederacy, G. A. R., and Women's Relief Corps were present by special invitation. A strong sermon was preached by the Rev. F. R. Godolphin, rector of Grace Church, Oak Park, Chicago, and volunteer chaplain at Camp Bowie and the aviation fields near Fort Worth.

TEXAS.

Rt. Rev. G. H. Kinsolving, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. C. S. Quin Accepts Election.

The Rev. Clinton S. Quin, rector of Trinity Church, Houston, who was elected Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese at the meeting of the Council on May 15-17, has accepted his election, subject to canonical confirmation.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. G. Gordon Smeade, Archdeacon of the Diocese, has accepted an invitation from the National War Work Council of the Y. M. C. A. of New York to deliver addresses to the soldiers at Camp Lee, Va., during the last week in July, and at Camp Meade, Maryland, during the first week in August.

Dr. Smeade is one of the most pleasing and entertaining speakers among the Clergy of the South, and is ever ready to assist in any kind of patriotic work.

A PRAYER.

(Composed by a daughter of the King of St. Margaret's Chapter, Washington, D. C., just before the Red Cross parade in that city.)

Lord God of Hosts; Our Heavenly Father; Be with each one of us who goes forth today to march under Thy Royal Banner. May we remember that our flag bears Thy blood-red Cross of Mercy and Love to mankind. And may we count it a sacred joy and privilege to be in the company of those who represent Thy kingdom on earth, and who are marching in the cause of suffering humanity under Thy holy emblem. May each one who bears the cross on her forehead this day be found in that great throng of white-robed servants around Thy throne singing, "Worthy is the Lamb Salvation to Our God." And may all be done to Thy honor and glory "for His sake," and may it hasten the coming of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Amen.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. GARY MONTAGUE, Editor

What the doctors say about nationwide prohibition comes with special emphasis at a time when this matter is before Congress.

We, therefore, quote the following from the address of Dr. Arthur D. Bevan, this year's President of the American Medical Association.

In his inaugural address, Dr. Bevan said:

"Each member of the medical profession should take an active part in the propaganda against drink, and secure national prohibition, not years from now, but now, when it is so badly needed and will accomplish so much good, not only for our boys in khaki and in blue, but for the nation in arms. And when it has once been done away with, it could no more be resurrected after the war than could slavery."

National prohibition is too often looked upon as a fad and theory of the preachers, and this call to the doctors to rally to its standard from the head of the medical profession in the United States should be given the widest possible publicity.

German Great Headquarters Report on Bombing of Hospitals.

Berlin, June 6.—The official statement from German general headquarters says:

"There were successful raids on Red Cross hospitals behind the American lines in Picardy on the 29th ult. Enemy nurses were compelled to retire to cellars and caves, carrying such of their wounded patients as they were able to save. Civilians and babies in surrounding private houses met sanguinary losses from the bombs of our airmen.

"On the morning of the 30th, pressing our great successes earlier in the week, when hospitals back of the British lines were bombed with losses among staffs and patients of many score, we attacked successfully a Canadian hospital. Large Red Cross signs made the target plain for our unerring bombers. An American surgeon, performing an operation, was among the killed.

"On the night of the 31st our gallant airmen made a surprise attack on British hospitals, which had been bombed on the 19th, inflicting severe losses on sisters and patients, and retiring to base without casualty. The aim of our heroic fliers was made certain by a flare lighted by an imperial ace at great personal risk.

"While attacking hospitals at Villers-Cotterets, where five women nurses and canteeniers were killed, German aviators were treacherously fired upon by French aces. Five German machines were maliciously destroyed."

We have clipped the above from the "Red Cross Bulletin," and, therefore, feel that it is authentic.

Our object in publishing such an atrocity is not to arouse the hatred of our people, but to show clearly the German attitude of mind.

It may not be necessary to annihilate the Germans, but it will be essential to the safety of the world for democracy and Christianity to obliterate entirely the mental viewpoint which considers men, who are deliberately butchering "sisters" and "babies" as gallant and "heroic."

All sorts of peace proposals are sure to be made by the Germans as soon as they realize, as they will before long, that their cause is utterly hopeless.

"The Watch on the Rhine" will soon be turned to "Watch Us Whine."

We should not cultivate hate. It is a very dangerous thing, and injures those in whom it dwells almost as much as its objects.

But we must develop deep determination that when this war is over there shall be no vestige left in the world of the present viewpoint.

We must look upon those who hold such views as the Saviour looked upon the money changers in the temple court, and we must clear this world of all such with the same courageous thoroughness which He displayed.

Our Father's world is a world of love and joy, but they have made it a world of hate and desolation.

This is a thousand times more a holy war than were the Crusades, which were instigated and inspired by the Clergy.

A step in the right direction has been taken by Congress in the introduction and favorable committee report on the Trammell-Keating minimum wage bill for the District of Columbia.

This bill provides for a minimum wage for women workers in special industries after careful study of the occupation by a board composed of employers, employees and the public. It has been introduced as a war time measure by the Consumers' League of the District of Columbia.

While this bill is limited in territory to the District, and in scope to certain defined industries, nevertheless it is a beginning in the matter of wage regulation by legislation, and should have the earnest support of all forward looking people and lovers of justice.

It is particularly interesting at this time, when recent disclosures have brought the question of commercialized vice so prominently before the public, for, as the Governor of Virginia recently said at a conference on this subject, "Back of the vice question is the wage question."

Womans' Work Looms Large: With America feeding and financing a large part of the world in its struggle against the determination of autocracy to overwhelm it, there is no more important economic factor than the women in the homes of America. The handling of the food and the funds of each household rests largely with them. In order that the family may save the wherewithal to help the nation finance the war, the good judgment of the mother in the home must be constantly exercised, while to the end that the health and strength of the family may not be impaired by misguided economy or by improperly selected or badly prepared food, in the attempt to save important foodstuffs for the armies and peoples of the allies and for our own warriors, the American woman must have both sound discretion and a working scientific knowledge of food values.

Helpful in this regard, the Red Cross offers, through its Bureau of Dietitian Service, which is a branch of the Department of Nursing, a course in foods and cookery as outlined in the American Red Cross Text Book on Home Dietetics. In a bulletin issued on the subject this paragraph occurs:

"Let no one belittle the chance offered for service in this field of honor. To the woman who will not merely put hand but brain to the task, it offers shining opportunities. Many of our preconceived ideas of what is necessary for the proper nourishment of the body have been radically changed. Many a woman rightly rated an excellent cook is seeking the knowledge which will fit her to cope efficiently and scientifically with the new situation."

Elementary principles are outlined in the text book, showing the comparative values of foods, the necessity for a well-balanced diet for adult and child, sick and well, and it points out the practical application of the underlying principles of dietetics to buying, cooking, and serving food. The health and well-being of every family will doubtless be advanced by a careful study of this work by the women in the homes.

God Reigns!

Nor must we forget the undefeatable hope of humanity. At a time when all the facts seem to favor despair, and pessimism is most easily justified, there rises up an unconquerable hope of a better world to replace the old—the dawning of a day when darkness shall give way to light, wrong to rectitude, and hate to good-will. Even before any frontier had been crossed, almost before the first shot had been fired, the finest minds of all lands began to lay plans looking to a day when such a tragedy cannot be. It is indeed wonderful—this hope, this conviction, this dream of humanity still unshaken, a pillar of cloud by day, a pillar of fire by night. These are some of the things that remain amid the upheavals and overturnings of our time, and of all times, and they are tokens of a kingdom that cannot be moved.

God reigns!

His is the day
And the night of hate
And the storm of wrath
Shall pass away.

Love reigns!

Hers are the years,
And the age of peace
And of kindness
Shall banish fears.

Truth reigns!

God is on high,
And the pride of kings
And the lust of things
Are doomed to die.

Fifth Sunday After Trinity: Sunday morning we continue the law as given in Deuteronomy, using chapter five, which contains besides the Decalogue the story of the circumstances under which the law was given and closes with a passionate appeal to the nation for obedience. If the suggestion be permissible, the Clergy would do well to call the attention of their congregations to the Deuteronomic form of the fourth commandment as distinguished from and supplementing the more familiar Exodus form; the one basing observance of the Sabbath on its relation to creation, as though the necessity of periodical rest was embedded in the very nature of things, the other basing it upon Israel's experience in Egypt and their redemption therefrom. "The seventh day is a Sabbath unto Jehovah thy God; in it thou shalt not do any work, thou nor thy son nor thy daughter nor thy man servant, nor thy maid servant * * * that thy man servant and thy maid servant may rest as well as thou. And thou shalt remember that thou was a servant in the land of Egypt and Jehovah thy God brought thee out thence by a mighty hand and by an outstretched arm; therefore Jehovah thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day." This contains a more humanitarian appeal than the other and, besides, connects itself more directly with the Christian Sunday as itself also a memorial of redemption.

The New Testament lesson takes up the whole subject of government by law and carries it forward and upward to the Christian stage of revelation; showing that the law had produced neither universal nor even partial complete obedience, but had, on the contrary, revealed the universality of sin and the necessity of some other plan, viz., faith, as the means alike of getting into right relations with God and attaining character that is inwardly pure.

The first evening lesson was selected to illustrate the petition in the Collect that God would so order the course of this world that His Church might joyfully serve Him in godly quietness. It is part of the story of Balaam, when God's ancient Church was opposed by the Moabites, a situation analogous to times that produced this Collect. When "persecution raged against those who were faithful to their Christian profession." The second lesson is devoted to the idea of service; containing the two parables, one of the stewardship of wealth and the motive so to use our material goods as to make to ourselves friends "on the other side"; the other that of Dives and Lazarus, and the solemn warning against selfishness with our wealth. Both are aimed at that worldliness which gnawed the heart of Balaam like a canker.

The week day lessons simply continue the course readings, respectively, of the law, Proverbs, Acts of Apostles and the life of our Lord.

The lessons for next Sunday are: (1) Deuteronomy continued, an appeal for obedience to God's laws in the Promised Land (not merely as a condition of getting there); (2) the corresponding New Testament truth God as one, and all religion summed up for time and eternity in love to God and man; (3) union of prophetic and priestly conceptions of religion in the vision of Jehovah standing by the altar, and (4) the same in the institution of the Holy Communion.

The True Light Now Shineth.

Old sorrows that sat at the heart's sealed gate

Like sentinels grim and sad,
While out in the night damp, weary and late,
The King, with a gift divinely great,
Waited to make me glad;

Old fears that hung like a changing cloud

Over a sunless day;
Old burdens that kept the spirit bowed,
Old wrong that rankled and clamored loud—

They have passed like a dream away.

In the world without and the world within

He maketh the old things new;
The touch of sorrow, and stain of sin,
Have fled from the gate when the King came in,
From the chill night's damp and dew.

Anew in the heavens the sweet stars shine,

On earth new blossoms spring;
The old life lost in the Life divine,
"Thy will be mine, my will is Thine,"
Is the new song the new hearts sing.

The Battle of Life.

I must be strong of soul and staunch of heart,
No matter what the odds;
The long day's sturdy struggle is my part—
The far result is God's.

Not mine to wet the page of yesterday
With unavailing tears,
Nor strive to clear the mystery of a way
Far leading through the years.

Mine just to meet and conquer, hour by hour,
The thing that men call Fate,
Going from strength to strength, from power to power,
Rising from state to state;

Fighting, face star-ward, through the changing wars
With which a world is rife,
So that my soul may borrow from the stars
Courage and light and life;

Cleaving the shadows with unswerving faith,
So I may move aright;
Down to the valley of the shade of death
Walking a path of light;

Till at the last, weary, I touch the goal
And know the journey blest,
Ready, though staunch of heart and strong of soul,
Aye, ready for my rest!

War Sayings.

The tremendous struggle that is altering the whole face of the earth bids fair to leave its mark on the English tongue also. Many novel words and phrases have been coined in the great mint of the war—a sort of new currency to meet the peculiar demands of the hour. Some of these expressions will survive as slang only, perhaps, but it is safe to prophesy that others will live on, an incorporate part of the language. None, it would seem, can ever be altogether lost—they are cast in too strong a mould and stamped too clearly with the superscription of these strange, unparalleled times.

The British have a wonderful phrase that rings with the keynote of the whole war—"carry on." In the field, in the camp, in the watching, serving home land it is their watchword; it is the very spirit of fighting England. "Carry on!" they cry—because of all, and in spite of all, and through all—carry on till the end; if one fighter falls, let another take his place, if one standard-bearer is overthrown, let another snatch the flag. That slogan is more formidable and effective than a whole battle-line of bristling guns.

President Wilson, with one golden phrase, made our American slogan. "Safe for democracy" is unforgettable; no nation from henceforth will ever be able to put it out of mind—as no nation will wish to. Just as immortal, perhaps, is another great war-cry, a word that literally leapt into being when the French found themselves face to face with the vast invading army that threatened the very heart of their beloved land. With the alien horde little more than the breadth of a slender stream away, "They shall not pass!" the defending general cried to his men. They caught up his cry, and the enemy was turned back. Still those four words are the steadfast motto of fighting France; and still, after nearly four years, the Germans have not passed.

A war-word that is full of curious appeal is "Blighty"—British soldier synonym for England, or its equivalent, "home." There are numerous explanations of its origin. A long time resident of India traces it back to the Hindustani "bilat," a word meaning "foreign country"—or, to the mind of the native, England. The adjective is "bilati." Whatever may have been the derivation of the word, from now on it will stand for nothing but the soldiers' yearning picture of his home land. "I'm off to blighty," the wounded Tommy grins as they lift his stretcher—"Going back to blighty!" They have another term for the other journey that soldiers take—the long trip without return. The dead men have "gone west." This expression, also, was in existence before the war, but as in the case of "blighty," the war has issued it re-coined. Somehow, the saying does not seem altogether arbitrary: it has both a poetical and a practical significance. The setting sun, its day's work over, goes west—at least so far as our human eye is concerned. And in that direction the march of progress moves—"westward the star of empire takes its way." We associate all romantic journeying, all high adventure with the western horizon. One cannot ponder the expression without realizing how the fighting men came to appropriate it to their use.

"Over the top" is a pungent phrase direct from the battle field. It brings up a sharp, instantaneous picture—the swift, unswerving charge of a company across a trench's lip—but it has been stretched to cover a dozen kindred ideas. "Over the top" in a Liberty Loan drive, "over the top" in a food conservation canvass, "over the top" in any kind of national or personal achievement that has to do with this war. It fairly flames with its meaning—dauntless resolution that will not be denied; it is all the power and purpose of the allies crowded into four explosive syllables. After the war (another magic phrase) when the dictionary is revised, along with our histories and geographies, "over the top" will surely be included among the phrases that cannot be dispensed with. Anyway, it will always be a part of our English speech.

Helping Children to Give.

Getting is a necessary preliminary to giving, and the ways of getting money for this purpose are not always free from objection. It remains either to earn or to save, and a good many children have no allowance, and very little income of any sort from which to save up missionary or "charity" money.

It is never hard to implant the desire to give. The impulse to generosity is an attribute of lovable childhood, but it usually exists quite apart from any thought of self-denial and often apart from anything like persevering effort toward helpfulness. It is an impulse merely, and needs cultivation like other childish germ-virtues. How to do this in the best way is one of the mother's greatest problems.

A minister on his way to the morning service was spied by one of the little girls of the parish, who skipped up to him and put her tiny hand confidently in his, as she held up to him a little bead purse.

"Look!" she cried, opening the clasp to show a shining silver dollar. "It's all mine—my earned money! Isn't it a lot for the poor little children you told us about?"

He praised and inquired about it, and she, with great pride, told him how she had "earned it with chickens."

"But we never, never could," she added, honestly, "only mother helped us. She did the thinking part and we did the work. Some day, she says we can do the whole of it."

In this little story lies the whole theory of helping children to give worthily. They need somebody to help do the thinking for them. Preferably, the work should be of some productive sort—a pansy-bed; chicken or rabbit raising, if they incline to it; something which has outdoor interest and pleasure connected with it. There are two opinions in regard to allowing children to take pay for running errands for the home folks or for neighbors. I know more than one child who would indignantly resent offered pay for doing such favors. Personally, I should encourage that view of it. But there are a hundred ways in which children may really earn money to carry out their own generous impulses without depending on father or mother or friends for the wherewithal.

A little thought will convince any one that it is the way of self-respect and real benevolence. Instead of talking much about the duty or delight of giving, I should take both for granted and try to suggest ways in which the kind thought might be carried out. Practical help is best given by suggestion, letting the child work out the details, rather than providing for all difficulties.

Ways in which children may make money are so numerous that one need not catalogue them, but a few groups may be mentioned. Children love to care for them, and such work usually become a pleasant hobby. Chickens, lambs, rabbits—all such little creatures, the care of which teaches so many good lessons, apart from any thought of profit; raising of fruits or vegetables; sewing for girls, whittling for boys; flower-gathering or herb-gathering for either, all of these are practical. In a country town, the boys and girls gather golden-seal for a neighboring druggist. Other herbs find a ready market. In one place where checkerberries or pigeon-berries grow, the children gather bushels of them and sell them to a city market. One mother helps her boys and girls make popcorn balls, which they sell to a nearby grocer, from whom they obtained a standing order. There is no limit to the number of money-making hints, but some of these may set some other thinking. Let a child give his own money which he has earned, and the spirit behind the gift will mean something, both to himself and to the recipient of his gift.—Mother's Magazine.

FAVORITE HYMNS.

VII. Rock of Ages.

Perhaps no hymn in any collection is so widely known or so well beloved as Rock of Ages. When the magazine,

"Sunday at Home," took the plebiscite of thirty-five hundred of its readers as to which are the best of the sacred songs, this stood at the head of the list. It would probably hold first place in a more general test also, for it has an appeal that is almost universal; the simple words are a veritable cry of the soul.

Rock of Ages was written by Augustus Toplady, a writer of many other hymns, and a Calvinist vicar of a parish in England. The poem was composed as a sort of metrical argument against the doctrine of sanctification, and aimed at the Westleys, with whom he had many theological controversies. Toplady called it "a living and dying prayer for the holiest believer in the world." He wrote it in 1776, and sent it off to the Gospel Magazine, doubtless with little idea that he was rendering permanent service to mankind far over and above its controversial value.

Mr. Gladstone translated this hymn into Latin, Greek and Italian. There are countless associations with the English version. Albert, Prince Consort, called for the hymn when he was dying, and General Stuart, of the Confederacy, sang it with his dying strength. When the steamship "London" sank in the Bay of Biscay fifty years ago, the last sound that the last survivor heard as the small boats pushed away from the wreck, was the voices of those left behind lifted in Rock of Ages. "No other English hymn can be named," says one writer, "that has laid so broad and firm a grasp on the English speaking world."

Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee;
Let the water and the blood,
From Thy side, a healing flood,
Be of sin the double cure,
Save from wrath and make me pure.

Should my tears forever flow,
Should my zeal no languor know,
All for sin could not atone,
Thou must save, and Thou alone;
In my hand no price I bring,
Simply to Thy cross I cling.

While I draw this fleeting breath,
When mine eyelids close in death,
When I rise to worlds unknown,
And behold Thee on Thy throne,
Rock of Ages, cleft for me,
Let me hide myself in Thee.

Limited.

The accompanying sadly significant little skit is taken from a recently published book of poems. It is clear-cut in its cleverness; it is a fine literary example of multum in parvo; it is—alas—tremendously true to life:

I am riding on a limited express, one of the crack trains of the nation.
Hurling across the prairie into blue haze and dark air go fifteen all-steel coaches holding a thousand people.

(All the coaches shall be scrap and rust and all the men and women laughing in the diners and sleepers shall pass to ashes.)

I ask a man in the smoker where he is going and he answers: "Omaha."

To a Mother.

It is hard, perhaps impossible, to say anything that will help you to forget your loss or that can dull the sense of emptiness in your heart for the boy who is gone. That consolation it is beyond the power of words to bestow, but it will come to you of itself, unsought and unexpected—a light from the glory of the great cause that has taken him. You are his mother, and therefore have had a mother's dreams for your son. You taught him to be honest—with himself as with others. You set his feet in the difficult path of courage and helped him to walk in it. You encouraged him to think little of himself, but much of others, and to hate injustice and cruelty; and you made him see that for us Americans the love of country is not love for a mere set of geographical boundaries or a political system, but for a body of moral principles, a creed of justice and liberty. As the years passed you had the supreme happiness—the deepest and most enduring satisfaction that life affords—of seeing your aspirations take form and express themselves in your son's character, and of knowing that it is your dreams and your guidance and teaching that have made him what he is. When the call came he heard it and was ready. He went in the purity of his youth, with his visions all undimmed and his heart on fire with noble passion. So, for you, he will always remain. It is your high privilege—and in the years to come it will be your proud comfort—to remember that, having made him worthy, you also gave him the great opportunity that he took so gladly, and by your sacrifice set the seal of success on both your lives. Your reward and your peace are the assurance in your heart that now and forever "it is well with the child."—The Youth's Companion.

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

Fresh Vegetables.

The food administration gives good advice as to the use and preparation of fresh vegetables. There are so many different varieties of vegetables, and so many different ways of cooking them, that the housewife will find in her summer and fall gardens rich material for her daily menus. The frequent substitution of vegetables for meat is not only excellent economy, but a practical health measure, since they provide various highly necessary elements for the building up and nourishing of the body.

Lettuce, onions, cauliflower, spinach, Brussels sprouts and the like are most healthful foods; so are dandelions, lamb's quarter and other wild growths that can be had in the country at least, for the picking. Tender beet, onion and turnip tops need not be thrown away when the body of the vegetables is cooked; they can be boiled for greens, and are very appetizing.

Points to remember in cooking fresh vegetables:

Vegetables just out of the garden taste best when simply cooked—steamed, boiled or baked—and served with a little salt, butter, milk or cream. Often a heavily-seasoned sauce covers up the more desirable vegetable flavor. Overcooking of vegetables impairs their flavor. Very delicate flavors are destroyed thereby, while vegetables with strong flavors, such as cabbage or onions, become disagreeably strong if cooked too long. Overcooking also destroys the attractive color of some vegetables.

Drain all boiled vegetables as soon as they are tender—they become soggy if allowed to stand undrained after cooking. The water drained off may be saved for soup stock. Most vegetables should be cooked in a small amount of water, because a part of the mineral salts dissolves out into the water, and is lost if the water is thrown away.

Cook whole when possible. Tender spinach or lettuce leaves require no added water for cooking. If thoroughly washed, enough water will cling to the leaves to prevent them from burning.

Delicately-flavored vegetables should be steamed or cooked slowly in a small amount of boiling water until tender and the water boils away. Strong-flavored vegetables may be cooked uncovered in a large amount of rapidly-boiling water, and the water changed several times during cooking. Starchy vegetables should be put on to cook in a sufficiently large amount of boiling water to cover them. Boil gently, and keep kettle covered.

The time required for cooking vegetables depends on the kind, size and age of the vegetable. The cook must use her judgment in deciding when they are done, but a time-table may be of help.

Time-table for cooking fresh vegetables in water:

Asparagus	15-20 minutes
Beans, Lima (green)...	¾- 1 hour
Beans, string.....	1- 3 hours
Beets, old	3- 4 hours
Beets, young	¾- 1 hour
Cabbage	20-30 minutes
Carrots	30-60 minutes
Cauliflower	20-30 minutes
Corn, green	10-15 minutes
Onions	20-30 minutes
Parsnips	30-45 minutes
Peas, green	20-30 minutes
Potatoes	30-40 minutes
Spinach	15-30 minutes
Squash	20-30 minutes
Turnips	30-45 minutes

My Lord.

Estelle T. Oltrogge, Jacksonville, Fla.

Should I live to be a hundred years old
Never again can I be alone,
For my dear Lord holds my hand in His,
Around me forever His arm is thrown,
My Lord, my merciful Lord.

'Twill never be dark again for me,
For the light of heaven is across my way,
Pointing each pitfall, showing each snare;
Christ makes it all as bright as day,
My Lord, my gracious Lord.

Farewell forever to the power of sin,
No longer I'm bound by Satan's chain;
Christ reigns in my heart, to Him be praise,
For He has broken sin's bond in twain,
My Lord, my powerful Lord.

My Lord is coming some glad, sweet day,
His footsteps already His faithful hear.
For His coming they long, they watch and pray,
No cloud's in the sky, the sunset is clear,
For the Lord, our Lord, is very near.

The Truth About Prayer.

"We do not go to God for some gifts, and importune Him until He complies with our complaint. He only truly prays who goes upon his knees to find God's will concerning himself. It is more important for me to find out from God what I ought to have than for me to tell God what I wish Him to give. Prayer is not so much a petition as an attitude of the soul. It is an atmosphere—the Christian's vital breath. I go to talk with God. I must not come away until He talks back. The end of prayer is to change eyes with God—to look at things from His standpoint, and to hush my selfish impatience in the presence of His perfect wisdom and love."

The Girl That Mother Was.

When we travel back in summer to the old house by the sea
Where long ago my mother lived, a little girl like me,
I have the strangest notion that she still is waiting there,
A small child in a pinafore with ribbon on her hair.
I hear her in the garden when I go to pick a rose;
She follows me along the path on dancing tipsy-toes;
I hear her in the hayloft when the hay is slippery-sweet—
A rustle now, a scurry now, a sound of scampering feet;
Yet though I sit as still as still, she never comes to me,
The funny little laughing girl my mother used to be.

Sometimes I nearly catch her as she dodges here and there,
Her white dress fluttering round a tree or flashing up a stair;
Sometimes I almost put my hand upon her apron strings—
Then, just before my fingers close, she's gone again like wings.
A sudden laugh, a scrap of song, a foot-fall on the lawn,
And yet, no matter how I run, forever up and gone!
A fairy or a firefly could hardly flit so fast.
When we come home in summer, I've given up at last.
Then I lay my cheek on mother's. If there's only one for me,
I'd rather have her, anyway, than the girl she used to be!

The Cave.

Roger and Ray had been playing for hours on the beach, when suddenly Ray pointed down the shore.

"I saw something white flash around that curve," she said. "There it is again!"

They sprang to their feet and raced hand in hand down the long beach. Presently they stopped short. "Here are footprints," said Roger. "Look, they came down that bank—small, bare footprints. Let's follow them!"

They traced the steps eagerly through the damp sand. "A boy and a girl, see if they're not," Roger told his sister. "Good, Ray—now we'll have somebody to play with!"

Ray and Roger were the only two children among the crowd of boarders at the big hotel on the cliff, and often they longed for playmates, so the little bare footprints in the sand raised their hopes high. But all at once the trail stopped short. Ray gave a little cry of disappointment. "Why, where did they go?" she cried.

Roger was close to the bank, tugging at a curtain of vines that hung over the steep edge. "Here!" he said triumphantly. Then he stooped and looked at the ground. "They did go in here," he added, "but they came out again, too, and skinned right up the cliff." He pulled aside the curtain of vines, and there before them was a little cave that looked like a small room hewn out of the rock. The children scrambled in and peered about in the dimness. The change from broad daylight to the half gloom of the little cave was so great that at first they could not see clearly, but in a moment Ray gave a squeal of delight. "Roger, it's furnished!"

Sure enough it was. In the middle of the floor stood a tiny table made out of a box, laid for two, with a couple of old tin plates that had been scrubbed clean, two broken tumblers and some shells. There were two chairs, also made out of boxes, and a curious sideboard that had once been a keg, fitted up with a cracked mirror. The floor was carpeted with sea-weed, and yellow daisies stuck in sea-shells ornamented crooked little shelves in the corners.

The two explorers stopped and looked at each other. They had had pretty things to use and to look at all their lives, and somehow the pitiful plainness of the little cave playhouse touched them. "What do you suppose they eat in their tin plates?" Roger asked in a low voice.

For answer Ray lifted the lid of a rough box near the door. There, stored carefully away, were a few small apples, a half a loaf of dark looking bread and a tiny bottle of syrup. "What a funny tea party that would have made," observed Ray. Suddenly her face brightened. "Roger, why can't we make a real party for them?" she cried.

A half hour later they climbed carefully down the steep cliff path to the cave. Between them they carried a basket of good things that they had begged from good-natured Mrs. Perly, the head of the Seaview house. "Let's hurry," said Roger. "The owners of the cave may be back at any minute, you know."

They worked busily, laughing and chatting as they bustled to and fro. "They must have heard us coming," Roger said, "and run out of the cave and up the cliff. I wonder who they are?"

At last everything was finished. A snowy tablecloth covered the bare box; a little teaset of pink and white took the place of the tin pans. There was a vase of roses in the center, and a glass dish of honey at one end. Crisp brown cookies, golden bananas and tempting sandwiches made up the rest of the feast, with some cold, clear lemonade that Ray poured from a bottle, the last thing, into a pretty pitcher. "Now!" she said, with satisfaction.

"We'd better slip away," said Roger, wisely. "Maybe they wouldn't like to catch us in their cave." But he was too late; voices could be heard, and a scuffling sound on the bank near the door. "Here—hide!" he said, hastily. And drew his sister quickly behind some old boxes in a corner. Their hearts beat fast.

"Oh, isn't this fun?" said Ray, whispering. "And a little while ago we thought we were lonely."

Peering around the boxes they saw the vine door open and two children come in—a boy and a girl, as they had guessed, the boy about Roger's age and the girl just a little younger than Ray. They were both barefooted, and the girl wore a short, faded little dress, but their faces were bright and eager as they stepped inside their playhouse. For a minute they stood blinking in the half darkness, while Roger and Ray squeezed each other's hands in their hiding-place. Then the little girl gave a cry. "Look at our table!" she exclaimed, jumping up and down excitedly. "Oh, Dick, is it fairies?"

The boy's black eyes were taking in everything—china, dainties and all. "No, not fairies," he said. "They don't bring stuff like that. Say, do you s'pose we can eat it?"

All at once the sharp eyes spied a red ribbon bow that had bobbed over the edge of a box in the corner. He lowered his voice. "Wait, somebody's in here," he said.

Roger heard the whisper and knew it was useless to hide any longer. He stepped out into the floor, and Ray followed him shyly. "I hope you didn't mind," he said. "We found your cave, and we thought we'd fix a surprise."

"We were lonely," added Ray.

The two newcomers were shy, too, but they were so delighted with the surprise that they could not stay bashful long. In a little while four places were set at the box table and four children were feasting.

"Ho!" said Roger. "This is lots of fun!"

Little Polly looked across the table at Ray and laughed. "Just suppose you hadn't seen my sunbonnet flap around the bend!" she said.

The Best Helpers.

The apostles learned many things from Jesus. Some of these things He taught them by example, just as you teach your little brothers and sisters when you are gentle and unselfish. Other lessons came in answer to their questions.

They had not been with Him very long before they noticed His habit of prayer. Before He began His work He would pray to His heavenly Father for help. When He had had a busy day He liked to go to some quiet place and talk to the loving Father. This was very different from the way in which the friends had learned to pray.

They may have noticed, too, that He always came back refreshed and strengthened. One day our Lord led His friends out of the city, along a country road and up a hill that was called the Mount of Olives. From the top one could see the temple at Jerusalem, the silvery Jordan river, and the pleasant vineyards and orchards. Here in the shade of the old, old olive trees they sat at His feet and listened.

The lesson that day was about prayer. Jesus told them that they were to go to God the Father just as little children come to their parents. They were not to stand on the streets praying aloud, so that men might see them and praise them, but to pray in the silence of their own rooms. So that God who saw in secret would reward them openly.

They were to ask for what they wanted; to tell God about their happy times and their sad ones, and all of the things that troubled them. And He would hear and answer in the way that was best for them.

Then He taught them the most beautiful prayer in the world, which is called the Lord's Prayer. It is so simple that a little child can understand it, and yet it includes everything for which we need to ask.

It is used at every service of the Church and at Holy Communion we say it twice. Isn't it wonderful to think that we say the very words our Lord used in talking to His Father? We think, as we say the prayer, of how we are all one great family, even though we are scattered all over the world; and that God is our Father.—Shepherd's Arms.

Evening.

Anne Wayland, Aged 10.

Evening, evening! time of sweet repose:
The lamb ceases playing, the bird flies to her nest.
All's still. The lowing of the cow has stopped;
All seek quietest sleep and rest.

The lamb, so playful in the daytime,
Frisking round and round,
Now is sleeping by the old sheep's side,
Safe and sound.

The bird has long since flown
To her nest, and now does sleep
With her eggs beneath her breast;
Those treasures she does keep.

O evening is truly a time of rest,
When the lamb is asleep and the bird's in her nest!

Pickers and Pails.

There were five of them gathering blackberries: Ellie and Dell, Nona and Peter, and tiny Mac. They were waist-deep in blackberry bushes and knee-deep in daisies—all but Mac, on whom the bushes were shoulder high. Steadily, up and down the line, sounded soft thuds—the plunk, plunk of ripe berries dropping into empty pails. Earnest faces peered from under broad-brimmed hats, and hands were busy. After a while, when the first important moments had passed, five tongues were loosened.

"My, but they're husky black chaps!" ten-year-old Peter cried. "See if I'm not the first to get my bucket full!"

"See if I'm not!" Ellie and Nona cried back together.

"Mine's going to be full first," Mac piped, gazing anxiously from between two bushes, "See if it's not!"

The others all laughed. "Then you'll have to work faster than you've done before," they told him, "cause the truth is, Mac Morton, you're not very, very much at blackberrying!"

Now, little Mac liked to be thought as big and swift as anybody. So he went furiously to work, dropping berries into his pail so fast that they made a grand racket, and breathing hard.

Ellie tiptoed up and looked over his shoulder. "I wish you'd look at what Mac's doing!" she exclaimed. "He's got tiny green berries in his bucket no larger than beads—dozens of 'em."

But the youngest picker covered his pail with his broad straw hat and would not let the others see, for he was mortified and hurt. As soon as Ellie went away, he began picking out and throwing aside the small green berries as hard as he could.

A half hour passed, and the voices of the other children grew fainter as they separated in their search, some keeping along the fence line, others wandering off toward the middle of the field. The sun grew hotter and hotter, and it seemed to Mac, struggling in the middle of a big patch of bushes, that the blackberries became fewer and fewer. Once he lifted up his voice shrilly. "The birds must have eaten them all," he cried, "the birds must have eaten them all!" But nobody answered—because nobody heard—and he went on toiling. His nose was blistered, his hands covered with scratches, but still the shining tin sides of the pail showed deep and bare; you could have measured the depth of the berries with one finger.

He looked at them and sighed. "I'll go farther down," he thought, and started to strike out in another direction.

But this was not so easily done. Indeed, it could not be done at all, because while he worked, he had turned around and around, as if on a pivot, from bush to bush, and now the long briar branches had fastened themselves upon him, clinging and clutching like long arms, catching his blouse, his trousers, even tangling in his thick bobbed hair. He was a prisoner among the blackberry bushes, with less than a pint in his pail, and the other children far afield, picking and laughing as they picked.

It was Dell who missed him, later on, and hurried back to find him. When the others joined her, they all stood still a moment, looking at him. He was fast asleep in a little bundle on the ground, the green branches tangling him still. Two small scratched knees showed beneath the Russian blouse, and one scratched hand grasped the pail with its few pitiful berries at the bottom.

"How he'll cry when he wakes and finds us ready to go," said Ellie, eyeing the pail.

"It's always this way," Nona added. "He can't understand that he's too little to do things. Here, let's put some of our own berries in his bucket and then take him home."

"N—no," Peter objected, thoughtfully, "that wouldn't do." Peter was a boy himself. "A chap wouldn't like to wake up and find that a lot of girls had done his work for him, you see. But bother! He's too little to try things like this, and we've got to be going."

"You three can go," Dell said, gently. "I'll bring him on, presently."

Nona and Ellie ran off, but Peter lingered. "I'll help untangle him, Dell," he offered. "Wake up, Mackie, old man!"

Mac sat up, blinking, and as his troubles rushed back over him, his lip quivered for an instant. Dell and Peter were pulling the briars away gently. "It's nearly time to start home," Dell said, smiling till he smiled back. "You must make haste with your berries."

"I know a dandy place," Peter cried. "Berries thick as hops. Let me show you!"

They hurried him over to the dandy place. Peter kept back the cruel briars and Dell held the pail, and there, sure enough, were big, juicy berries shining everywhere. Mac began picking with both hands, as hard as ever he could pick, and as the plunk, plunk in the bottom of the bucket grew softer and softer, he laughed louder and louder with delight. For with his own hands he was filling the pail to the brim.

When they reached home, five half-gallon pails waited in a row on the water shelf with five pickers in a row beside them, while mother stood ready with the scales for measuring.

Usually, when the berries were measured, Mac hid his face in her skirts; but this time, he danced and jumped. For, when the last pail was empty, the youngest picker, by an ounce and a half, had picked the biggest lot of berries!—Sunday-school Times.

Soldiers Never Ask "Why."

Julia and Linda were two sweet little girls. Julia, the elder of the two, had contracted a very funny habit. When father or mother told her to do anything that was a little distasteful to her she would invariably say, "Why?" and then Linda would proudly join in with her "Why?"

Father said, "My dear daughter, soldiers never ask why; they obey without asking the reason."

One day mother said, "It's such a nice, warm and sunny day, let's take our lunch and go in the woods." Julia and Linda were so overjoyed at the thought of a picnic that they forgot to ask "Why?"

They made a number of little, thin sandwiches and rolled them in waxed paper, tucked these with some fluffy sponge-cake in a basket, and joyfully started out.

It was only a little way to the woods, and the children hopped and skipped merrily over the road, while father and mother walked behind; and presently they turned into the cool shade of the chestnut grove. Just beyond the woods was a high bank along which was a railroad track; and Julia said, "May we go and see if any trains are coming?"

Trains always had a great fascination for the little girls, so father and mother said yes, and they all went farther on and sat on a rock in the field, where they could see the train if it went by.

Presently Julia said, "Father, I see something moving on the bank, close by the track. What is it?" And Linda added:

"Look, there are five, six, seven little animals there?"

Sure enough, there was a big, fat mother woodchuck and a family of little baby woodchucks, and they were running about over the bank, and up and down the tracks.

"Probably some of the cars drop grain, and they are hunting for it," said father.

Suddenly the mother woodchuck sat up alertly and made a queer little noise. Instantly every baby woodchuck flew to her, and together they disappeared into their hole.

"Why," exclaimed the girls in one breath, "why did they do that?"

Father was silent. Not a sound was heard for several seconds; then away off in the distance an engine screeched, then a rumble was heard nearer and nearer, and a train rushed over the track. After it was gone and everything was quiet, father said, "Did either of you hear one of those little woodchucks ask why they must go in when their mother called?"

From that day on Julia and Linda never again asked "Why" foolishly.—Selected.

Under the Umbrella.

Three small boys were sitting under the umbrella, which was small, too.

The boys were rather ragged, and so was the umbrella. Two long slits let through a scattering downfall of both sunshine and shower from a clear blue April sky, and at the end of one of the ribs the silk had broken loose, and was on its way up to the top.

But the three chums crowded close together and took turns sitting in the middle, holding the umbrella. Each was chewing one-third of a stick of gum, and all were deliciously cosy and happy.

"If I had a dollar," said Pinky, "I'd buy us a great big umbrella that 'ud cover us up just as slick."

CHURCHMEN AT CAMP LEE.

Once again men chosen under the selective draft law are coming in large numbers to Camp Lee. In order that the churches in Petersburg may get in touch with newly arrived Churchmen, I most earnestly request rectors of parishes to send me the names and regimental addresses of men coming to Camp Lee from their parishes. Names are useless without company and regiment. Brethren, please act on this request before you forget it.

RESOLUTIONS.

At the annual congregational meeting of Christ Church Parish, Savannah, the following resolutions were unanimously adopted, and ordered printed in the Southern Churchman by the vestry:

Whereas, Mr. C. Lucian Jones was on April 22, 1889, elected a member of the vestry of this church; and

Whereas, on April 11, 1890, he was elected Junior Warden of this church, and served as Junior Warden until April 2, 1891; and

Whereas, on April 21, 1892, he was elected Junior Warden of this church, and served as such for two years; and

Whereas, he was again elected Junior Warden of this church on April 15, 1895, and has continued as such until this time; and

Whereas, Mr. Jones' services as vestryman and warden of this church have been signalized by his earnest devotion to his duty and he has rendered valuable services as such vestryman and warden; and

Whereas, Mr. Jones has on this date, being the first day of April, 1918, decided to decline re-election as Junior Warden of this church;

Now be it resolved by the rector and congregation of Christ Church in meeting assembled, That they do express unto Mr. Jones by unanimous rising vote their appreciation of his loyal service during so many years.

That they regret that he will no longer be associated with them in the actual service of the vestry, but trust and pray that he may live many years to serve as a loyal member of this church; that they express to him their wishes for his continued welfare and pray that God's richest blessings may rest on him.

Resolved, further, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Mr. Jones.

RESOLUTIONS.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted by the vestry of St. John's P. E. Church, Portsmouth, Va., held June 10, 1918:

Legh Richmond Powell, for more than twenty years a member of the vestry of St. John's Protestant Episcopal Church of this city, and for five years its Junior Warden, died at his residence in this city on the afternoon of Thursday, June 6, 1918.

We, his associates, desire to enter upon the minutes of this parish, an expression of our high appreciation of his character as a Christian gentleman, and as a faithful and efficient co-worker in the cause of the Master.

As a man he was singularly gentle and unobtrusive, but true to his convictions, and ever ready to maintain them.

As a vestryman he was prompt and faithful in the discharge of the duties incident to the position, and always anxious to aid in all matters looking to the upbuilding of this church, in whose service, as its faithful pastor, his father, the late Rev. John D. Powell, devoted twenty-seven years of a long and consecrated life.

In giving this expression of our sorrow at his death, and the loss sustained by this church, of which he was so long a consistent member, we must not fail to recognize that our "loss is his gain," that he was fully prepared and ready to answer the call of the Master, and to receive from Him the plaudit, "Well done."

Resolved, That a copy of this minute be sent by the Registrar of the vestry to the widow and to the widowed mother of our deceased associate, with the assurance of our loving sympathy and our earnest prayer that the God of all comfort may vouchsafe to each of them His richest blessing.

MINUTE ON THE DEATH OF BISHOP RANDOLPH.

The Trustees of the Bishop Payne Divinity School, meeting for the first time since our late President, the Rt. Rev. Alfred Macgill Randolph, D. D., LL. D., was taken from our head, would put on record our sense of loss in his departure and our grateful recognition of the sanctified talents, the exalted character and the consecrated life which made him so strong a leader, so wise a counsellor and so helpful and gracious a friend. Especially would we thankfully recall his long service and unflinching devotion to this institution and to the cause of sound religious training for the negro race which it is appointed to set forward.

Bishop Randolph's life long interest in the Church's mission to the colored people was based upon a clear apprehension of the conditions existing as well as a profound conviction of the duty involved. In one of the earliest Episcopal addresses which he delivered before the Council of Virginia, thirty-two years ago, he insisted upon the "saving power of Christian education" as the hope of the negro and the solution of all the problems connected with his presence here, and dwelt upon the peculiar adaptation of this Church for his instruction in righteousness and the consequent responsibility resting upon her. From this judgment he never departed, and to this task he gave earnest consideration and a full measure of his labors, neither misled by sentimentalism nor discouraged by difficulty. The work which has grown up in his own Diocese on these lines, and the influence which has gone from it throughout the Church, is no small part of the fruition of his labors, which follow him, and which, in this school of ministerial training especially should be held in lasting remembrance.

Former Health Commissioner Says Nuxated Iron

Should Be Used in Every Hospital and Prescribed by Every Physician—Attributes His own Great Physical Activity Today at Over 60 Years of Age Largely to His Personal Use of Nuxated Iron

WHAT FORMER HEALTH COMMISSIONER KERR SAYS

"As Health Commissioner of the City of Chicago, I was importuned many times to recommend different medicines, mineral waters, etc. Never yet have I gone on record as favoring any particular remedy, but I feel that in Nuxated Iron an exception should be made to the rule. I have taken Nuxated Iron myself and experienced its health-giving, strength-building effect, and in the interest of the public welfare, I feel it my duty to make known the results of its use. I am well past my three-score years and want to say that I believe that my own great physical activity is due largely today to my personal use of Nuxated Iron, and if my endorsement shall induce anemic, nervous, run-down men and women to take Nuxated Iron, and receive the wonderful tonic benefits which I have received, I shall feel greatly gratified that I made an exception to my life-long rule in recommending it. From my own experience with Nuxated Iron, I feel that it is such a valuable remedy that it ought to be used in every hospital and prescribed by every physician in this country."

Wm R. Kerr

Former Health Commissioner, City of Chicago.

Former Health Commissioner Kerr has given years of his life fighting for public health in his own and other cities. It was he who introduced Anti-toxin for Diphtheria in Chicago's Health Department. He purified the milk for the Consumers and thereby helped to save the lives of thousands of babies. He introduced the anti-spitting ordinance which has been copied all over the country and also took care of the sewers and garbage in the interest of public health. It is positive that the widespread use of Nuxated Iron would greatly lessen the worries and troubles of Health Commissioners in keeping up a high standard of public health.

Manufacturer's Note—Nuxated Iron, which has been used by Former Health Commissioner Kerr with such surprising results, is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser or they will refund your money. It is dispensed by all good druggists and general stores.

at Elmira Heights and Horseheads and the Rev. Mr. Tabor is to be in charge at Willowdale and Romulus.

At St. John's Church, Grand Haven, Diocese of Western Michigan, on June 17 was ordained to the diaconate, Nicholas M. Feringa, A. B., of St. Stephen's College, and recently graduated at the General Seminary. He was presented by his father, the Rev. John H. Feringa, Ph. D., rector of St. John's Church. Other parts in the service were taken by the Rev. Messrs. William Galpin, rector emeritus of St. Paul's Church at Muskegon, who preached the sermon, Lincoln R. Vercoe acting Dean of St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral at Grand Rapids; William N. Wyckoff, rector of Grace Church at Holland, and David C. Huntington, rector of St. Paul's Church at Grand Rapids. Acting for the Rt. Rev. John N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese (now at the front in France), the ordination was done by the Rt. Rev. William Walter Webb, D. D., Bishop of Milwaukee.

Mr. Feringa is now curate of Trinity Church at Newport, R. I., the Rev. Stanley C. Hughes, M. A., rector.

In St. Philip's (colored) Church, Little Rock, Ark., on May 29, William Edward De Claybrook, D. D., was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Winchester. The candidate was presented by the Rev. D. E. Johnson, D. D., Arch-deacon of Colored Work, who also preached the sermon. Dr. De Claybrook is in charge of St. Mary's Church, Hot Springs, Ark.

In St. John's Church, Bangor, Maine, on Trinity Sunday, Mr. Alfred Martin, who has been serving at Millinocket as lay reader, was ordained to the diaconate by the Bishop of Maine. The candidate, who was presented by the rector of St. John's, the Rev. J. Edward Hand, will continue at Millinocket.

On the second Sunday after Trinity, in Christ Church, Warren, Ohio, the Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese of Ohio ordained to the diaconate Mr. John Arthur McDonald, a son of the rector of the parish, the Rev. L. P. McDonald, D. D., who presented the candidate. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Francis J. Hall, D. D., of the General Theological Seminary. Mr. McDonald has been appointed by the Board of Missions to a year of special preparation at the Teachers' College of Columbia University, after which he is to go to the district of Hankow, China, as a normal teacher.

On Sunday, June 16, in St. James Church, Chicago, Ill., the Trinity ordinations were held as follows: Messrs. Parkinson, Norman Bruce Quigg and Thomas L. Parker were ordained to the diaconate, and the Rev. Messrs. Walter B. Reed and Charles L. Street to the priesthood. Mr. Quigg was presented by the Rev. L. B. Hastings, Mr. Parker and the Rev. Mr. Reed by the Rev. H. W. Prince, and Mr. Parkinson and the Rev. Mr. Street by the Rev. James S. Stone, D. D., rector of St. James Church. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Edward A. Larabee, D. D.

In All Saints' Cathedral, Albany, N. Y., on Sunday, June 9, the Rev. Harry A. Hall, assistant minister at St. Paul's, Albany, and the Rev. J. L. Roney, minister-in-charge of St. Paul's Church, Schenectady, were advanced to the priesthood by the Bishop of the Diocese of Albany. The Bishop preached the sermon and the Rev. Mr. Hall was presented by his father, the Rev. Edwin A. Hall, and the Rev. Mr. Roney was presented by the Rev. J. A. Howell. The Rev. Mr. Hall will remain for the present at St. Paul's as assistant to the Ven. Roeliff H. Brooks, Arch-deacon of Albany, and the Rev. Mr. Roney will continue as minister in charge of St. Paul's, Schenectady.

Deaths.

The Rev. Walter S. Danker, rector of St. John's Church, Worcester, Mass., and chaplain of the One Hundred and Fourth Infantry, A. E. F., died on June 23, of wounds received in the German bombardment on last Sunday. Chaplain Danker is the first American chaplain to be killed in France. He was recently decorated with the Croix de Guerre for carrying in wounded men from No Man's Land under heavy fire.

Dr. William Polk, of New York, a distinguished physician and educator, died at Atlantic City, N. J., June 23. Dr. Polk was the son and the biographer of the Rt. Rev. Leonidas Polk, Bishop of Louisiana, and Lieutenant General in the Confederate Army, who was killed in the battle of Kennesaw Mountain. He was the father of Frank Polk, Counsellor of the State Department in Washington.

Deposition.

Notice is hereby given that on March 29, 1918, in the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, Pa., in the presence of the Rev. Wyatt Brown, Litt. D., and the Rev. Elroy Jeffery Jennings, Presbyters of the Diocese, I deposed from the sacred ministry, the Rev. August Michael Treschow, priest.

This deposition was pronounced at his request, upon his written renunciation of the ministry, under Canon 33 of the General Canons.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The world does not owe any man a living, but every man owes the world a life.

Whenever God suffers the Christian to have a need, it is to remind him that he has a God.

It may be that there would be more power in our praying if there were more heart in our giving.

To acquire the faith that removes mountains, we must first climb far crystal heights of prayer.

All God's giants have been weak men, who did great things for God because they reckoned on His being with them.

How many there are who will have to confess with Grotius, as the shadows deepen, "I have spent my life laboriously doing nothing!"

True spirituality has an enormous intellectual implication. Obedience to Christ's will through mental concentration carries with it the most fundamental human culture.

So many of us speak of the Lord and His righteousness as our sword, our helmet and our shield, and then, when the battle cry sounds suddenly, put our armor hurriedly away in a corner and try to fight alone, with our poor mortal fists.

It is not our own patience, justice or kindness that we are to show to those around us, but the pity and forbearance of Christ, whose Spirit dwells within us. Our own virtues will not endure the strain and friction of daily life; we must lean wholly on Him.

Tell them, "I am," Jehovah said. O'erhearing, Nature raised her head The message to impart. And sun and stars, and wind and deep, And forest, field, and mountain sweep, And bud and bloom, and bird and beast, All, from the greatest to the least, Mysterious, beyond the ken Of puny, skeptic-minded men, Replied, "O Lord, thou art!"

It is in the night that God gives the sweetest songs to His people. It is through the days of testing, through the darkness, through the deepest discipline of life that we learn the song which never dies; which is never discordant, which is full of praise, trust, love.

"Lord, crucified!
Give me a heart like Thine.
Teach me to love
The dying souls of men,
Oh, keep my heart
In closest touch with Thee!
And give me love,
Pure Calvary love,
To bring the lost to Thee."

God graduates the trials of our life. He allows the lesser to precede the greater. He gives us the opportunity of learning to trust Him in slighter difficulties, that faith may become muscular and strong, and that we may be able to walk to Him amid the surge of the ocean. Be sure that whatever are your sorrows and troubles at this hour, God has allowed them to come to afford you an opportunity of preparation for future days.

There is just so much cross in the world, and each man must bear his own if the world is ever going to be brought to God. Every man who shirks doubles another man's cross. It was because of men shirking that the Son of God staggered through the streets of Jerusalem in the loneliness of that cross-bearing. Let every man take his share of "hardness as a good soldier of Jesus Christ," and let the travail of the Spirit of God work through him to the redemption and transformation of the world; then let him follow Christ all the days.

The Shuttle Train.

Some of the trains on Boston's elevated railroad run clear through the city and out into the suburbs; but there are shuttle trains, which merely run back and forth between the north and south stations. Their work must be very monotonous, up and down the same short track, turning the same corners, stopping at the same few stations, hour after hour, day after day. Yet they are probably more useful than the through trains. They probably carry more passengers, and are an essential part of the city's transportation service.

Many of us are sadly conscious that our lives are mere shuttle trains, back and forth in the same dull routine of duty. Well, what of it? Perhaps we are more important as shuttle trains than as through trains, and are a necessary link in the service of the Heavenly City.—Selected.

Under the Umbrella.

"My! I wish 't you did have a dollar, Pinky," said Dumpy.

"N' I wish so, too," said Popsy.

"If I had a dollar," said Dumpy, "I'd lay it out fer gum. You kin buy a stick fer a penny, an' they's a whole hundred pennies in a dollar—so we'd have a hundred sticks o' gum. Think of that!"

"My! I wish 't you did have a dollar, Dumpy," said Popsy.

"N' so do I, too," said Pinky.

"If I had a dollar," said Popsy, "I'd buy streaked f'scream with it, and we'd sit here all so snug and eat that f'scream right straight up, every single bit! There, sir!"

And Pinky and Dumpy cried out with one voice then:

"My! I wish 't you did have a dollar, Popsy!"—Carrie A. Parker, in Little Folks.

The Power of Character.

Every Christian is producing two sets of influence. Two currents of power issue from him, which set in motion the wheels of life around him. One is the unconscious, involuntary influence of his real character; the other is the voluntary influence of what he consciously says and does—what he says and does for a special purpose. Now, these two currents that flow from him may be opposed to one another. The character may be saying one thing, and the lips and conduct another. A man may preach love to Christ and to men; but if his own heart and life are not saturated with this love he will preach in vain; for the language of his nature will be opposed to the language of his lips; the influence of his character will contradict the influence of his words. The power of character arises from its truthfulness.—H. Macmillan.

Are You Enlisted in the W. S. S. Societies?

OUR Boys are in the Trenches; let us exert every ounce of our energy in backing them up.

On June 28th there will be a nation-wide campaign to pledge millions of Americans to save to the utmost of their ability in every way possible the maximum amounts of War Savings Stamps until the end of the year. On that day everybody will have a big chance to help make our fighting forces effective, to really help win the war. As President Wilson asks,

"May there be none unenlisted on that day."

TRY THIS FOR YOUR HEALTH.

For diseases which do not readily yield to treatment, such as chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, rheumatism, Bright's disease, gall stones, uric acid poisoning, and diseases of the kidney and liver, the best physicians send their wealthy patients to the famous mineral springs. Some even spent months at the Spas of Europe and were almost invariably cured or greatly benefited.

I believe that the Shivar Spring is the greatest mineral spring ever discovered and I believe it so firmly that I offer to send you enough water for a three weeks' treatment (two five-gallon demijohns) on my guarantee that if it fails to benefit your case I will refund the price. You would hardly believe me if I told you that only about two out of a hundred, on the average, say that they have received no benefit. The water is restoring thousands. It restored my thought my case was incurable and I am willing and anxious for you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocketbook. If I win you become a life friend of the Spring. If I lose I will be sorry for you, but I will appreciate your courtesy in giving the water a trial and will gladly refund your money on request. Sign the following letter:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64-C, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial in accordance with instructions contained in the booklet you will send, and if I report no benefit, you agree to refund the price of the water in full on receipt of the two empty demijohns which I agree to return within thirty days.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othline—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othline—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othline, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

spiritual derelicts, members whose fervor has slumped." We quote:

They are ecclesiastical saunterers. You remember how that word is traced back to the old Crusaders returned from the Holy Land (the saint terre) who roamed over Europe without definite aim until they became a nuisance and a menace. Such is your religious saunterer. His name may still be on a church roll somewhere, or he may have become wholly unattached. He ought to be a faithful, working Christian. Instead he is a wandering star, counting for less than nothing in the service of the Master. There are millions of relapsed members of the Church in the world, who owe Christ zealous service but refuse to honor His claims upon them. Their talents are often greater than those of many a faithful worker. If they were but true to their early pledges the cause of Christ would have a host of strong recruits for all of its vacant posts. Oftentimes the best results of an evangelistic campaign is its discovery and revitalizing of these wasted lives.—Exchange.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

DISABLED CLERGYMEN AND THEIR FAMILIES IN DISTRESS.

We continue to receive letters of the most touching character, some addressed to us personally and most confidentially, others sent us by friends, which indicate that not a few of the former pensioners upon the General Relief Funds of the Church are in great need. It would be surprising if it were not so when we consider the advancing cost of the necessities of life. Many persons with what were comfortable incomes three years ago are now feeling the pinch of want since the purchasing power of what they have has been reduced by about sixty per cent. How much more must they feel it whose pittance was so meagre at best, whose friends are less and less able to assist them, and whose necessities increase with the infirmities of advancing age and frequent illness.

These worthies, for whose sufficient maintenance the Church has always considered herself bound, are the victims of a most unfortunate set of circumstances for which the Church ought to hold herself severely responsible. In her welcome to a system of pension insurance, based on the most rigid and mechanical principles of big business, designed to secure an increasingly adequate support for pensioners who should come thereafter and their families and to make the ministry of the Church more attractive to men of little faith, she made a most liberal provision of funds, for exceeding what was asked for, to meet all the initial requirements of the new system. At the same time she put a period to one of her most beautiful and beneficent charities, the free-will offerings of her people for the support of her old and disabled clergy already worn out in her service, and their dependents. The only proviso made was that these should continue to receive just what they happened to be receiving at a certain date, with no inquiry as to whether this was sufficient for their needs, present or prospective, with no certain provision made for supplying even this pittance, that being left for the Pension Fund to handle, with no possibility of their ever again being the beneficiaries of the growing liberality of the Church toward the very class to which they belong but from which they are artificially segregated, and especially with no provision against just such an emergency as has arisen, when, from unforeseen circumstances, their poor pensions have become of less than half their former value. Such at least is the interpretation of the Church's action upon which the management of the Church Pension Fund proceeds, to whose administration, under rules and regulations of their own making, the whole matter of disabled clergy relief has been committed. If their interpretation is correct, and we suppose it can be defended technically, then the Church, through her General Convention, has been guilty either of failure to safeguard the interests of these pensioners when she withdrew the resources she had pledged to them by her canon law, or of overconfidence in the capacity of the Pension Fund to represent her mind and spirit in an emergency, which so far has not been justified by the event.

We have been assured by officials of the Fund of their willingness to afford the relief desired out of certain funds which have or may come into their hands if the General Convention can and will give them authority to do so. But the General Convention is fifteen months off, and in the meantime old men and women are suffering and the Church is being put to shame. These are war times and are calling on every hand for war measures. Sometimes it is necessary in an emergency to do the obviously right thing at the right time and get the formal approval afterwards. In this case no one can doubt that it will be given so soon as the Church can speak.

The Pension Fund is the successor, the administrator and the heir of the old Clergy Relief Fund. If the latter were still in existence its faithful Secretary and Treasurer would have kept himself informed of the added needs of the beneficiaries of the Fund, and would long since have bestirred himself and the Church for their additional relief. If necessary the invested funds not otherwise pledged would have been expended to the last penny for the purpose. Those funds are now absolutely at the disposal of the Pension Fund, if our information is correct. But if the Pension Fund insist that they have no means that can be used for such a righteous purpose it is surely competent for them to discover the circumstances of these old pensioners, whose names and conditions are listed in their office, in this time of stress, and to appeal to the Church for the means necessary for their sufficient support.

We do not suppose that all the beneficiaries of the Clergy Relief Fund are in special need by any means, nor would we advocate under the circumstances an indiscriminate increase of the pensions they receive. It was the policy towards which the Relief Fund was working, as it is the policy of the Church Pension System, that pensions should rest on a "contractual basis," as of right and not of favor, and this had been reached to a large extent, so that many beneficiaries were on its list who were not dependent upon its bounty for a comfortable living. We cannot imagine that any of these would object if special relief should be granted to those who are in actual need, but if such objection should arise it could be disregarded with impunity. With a co-operating Committee in every diocese and with other facilities at hand it would be easy for the Pension Fund to learn confidentially who are in need and to find or make a way by which assistance can be afforded them. We suppose not many of those we have in mind live in New York or Boston. They were missionaries, or ministers in small and remote places, content to sit down in the lower rooms, with no opportunity and no ambition to gravitate to the large cities. But their Bishops and their clerical neighbors know who and where they are and the information can be obtained by a little pains. When this has been done the further duty will be made plain. That it ought to be done we think there can be no question.

THE CHURCH AND "WORLDLINESS."

A correspondent writes us of her distress at hearing the remark frequently bandied about, "Well, join the Episcopal Church and you can dance, play cards and enter into all the worldly amusements"; and, because her mother was a devout member of this Church, she wishes to know whether it be true that the Church "allows and upholds worldliness."

We judge, not only from her address given, but from the seeming disposition of her neighbors, that our correspondent lives in a remote section where folks have not learned that it is no longer considered good form to misrepresent other Christian people, even in ignorance. The way to find out what the Church allows or disallows is to consult the Bible and Prayer Book, which are the sources and standards of her teaching. From the former she instructs her children many times in each year to "be not conformed to this world," and to "love not the world, neither the things that are in the world." When she admits a member by baptism it is upon his avowal that he renounces "the vain pomp and glory of the world, with all covetous desires of the same, and wilt not follow nor be led by them"; and this promise is impressed in the catechism and is again demanded at his confirmation.

It is true that the Church, following the example of Holy Scripture, has not attempted to make a catalogue of the things, even of the amusements, that are "worldly." Even if such a thing were possible it would be quite contrary to the principles of spiritual training which require the cultivation in every soul of that spiritual instinct which detects and shuns whatever is hurtful, impure or unholy in its effect. "The world" is all that outside and around us, just as "the flesh" is all that within us, which makes us do or think or feel wrongly. "Worldliness" is the love of, choice of, pursuit of, these things to which we react hurtfully or sinfully; and its seat is in the soul and not in the environment. To make a list of amusements that are "worldly," and to suppose that by avoiding these we escape the insidious disease of worldliness, is to miss the warnings of God's word and expose the soul to many and great dangers. But this is not saying that these things are "approved," nor does it relieve the conscience from determining the matter for itself.

If our Lord's return means anything it means the introduction of a life which has no end; it means, for all who will, succession to the inheritance incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeeth not away. The coming of our Lord means that all the wrong-doing and the passions of man which create so much misery will have had their day; it means an entrance, actual or possible, upon a stage of existence in which there will be no sorrow nor crying; it means the exercise of man's higher powers to the fullest extent of their capacity—the beginning of an existence in which thought and heart and will rest in perfectly ecstatic satisfaction on their one true object, and an existence which will last forever.—Canon Liddon.

RELIGIOUS EDUCATION.

Mr. Editor: One of our Church periodicals has devoted a special number to the subject of Church schools, believing it to be "one of the pressing problems with which the Church in its educational capacity has to deal." It is said: "Until recently there has been little enthusiasm among us over the problem of religious education. The matter has gone by default. It is not unnatural that in periods of great expansion, whether in the Church or in the Nation, a good many things are left at loose ends."

One most important feature has been overlooked in the education of our youth. Very few people stop to ask themselves whether the religious faith of the faculties of our secular colleges and universities, especially, has anything to do with the religious education of the youth under their tuition. I have no hesitation in saying that there is absolutely nothing so important in the Christian culture of our boys as the active faith-profession of the members of the various faculties of our Church universities.

The Southern Baptists especially appear to be somewhat alarmed at a revelation of this fact, and at their national convention directed attention to the heresies that are actively creeping into faculties nominally under control of their Church! Chicago University is (nominally) Baptist, and as a matter of presumption, I infer they refer to this institution when they say by resolution: "A false sociology based upon materialistic unbelief has found its way into many American universities, among them some Baptist institutions which reek with the poison of German 'kultur' and has done untold mischief and harm."

It is to be noted that quite a number of prominent professors of our great universities are the intellectual offspring of German institutions. No wonder their teachings reek with German "kultur."

Having had the subject in mind for some little time, the action of the Baptist Convention strongly attracted my attention.

Most of your readers will recall an instance at Princeton University a number of years ago in which one of the faculty was dismissed from his chair for prostituting his office as a secular instructor of our youth by, openly and from the rostrum, antagonizing the teaching of modern Christendom. Had Princeton been a secular university the only trace of the presence of such a professor would have been in the profligate lives and lost faith of university students under his instruction.

As our modern American civilization is at once the consequence and superstructure of the Gospel of our Christianity, the menace of a single infidel in the chair of a popular university, who, as a rule, will use the confidence and faith inspired by his high position, for the purpose of destroying the religious convictions of the youth of our land, cannot be over-estimated!

Your subscriber was once associated with an able man, a co-member of a Pennsylvania faculty with which he also was connected, who remarked: "At one time in my college days the ministry was my highest aspiration. But remarks dropped by a member of the college faculty so upset my faith that I have never been able to re-establish it."

A writer who knows the colleges intimately says: "Those who are not in close touch with the great colleges of our country will be astonished to hear the nature of the creeds being fostered by the faculties of our universities. Briefly, not only is the Christian religion attacked, but the fundamental laws of the Decalogue, the existence of the Christian home, and the marriage bond are alike discredited. The negatives taught are: 'There is no absolute evil.' 'Immorality is only a variation from social custom.' 'Children are encumbrances in life.' 'There can be holier alliances in free love than in marriage.' It is stated that some of these persons honored with chairs in our universities expand the German Bernhardi's theory, 'No law above the German State,' to apply to the moral and religious consciousness of every intelligent man."

I have carefully reviewed the field referred to, and have come to two conclusions:

First, that the term "faculties" is too sweeping and comprehensive. Certain professors, it is true, are tolerated, who indulge in teaching similar to that of the gentleman who has been dismissed from the chair at Princeton. These use their class-rooms and interpolate into their scholastic teaching the most radical and iconoclastic dogmas (both in religion and in ethics), of which we can conceive. This teaching is dispensed from time to time with Euclid and Homer as well as theories of sociology to young men of Christian families—many of them the future vestrymen of our churches!

Second, that these teachings not only imperil every system of known religion, but in the words of Ralph Waldo Emerson, "the very hopes of man, the thoughts of his heart, the manner and morals of mankind are all at the mercy" of these men when we send our boys to sit at their feet. Is it not a question beyond dispute that the press of our country (Christian-secular as well as religious) should carefully note the records of the chairs of these universities and from time to time enlighten their readers as to the teaching tolerated among their faculties?

A quiet visit and investigation at the several universities indicated below will develop some startling facts. As preface let me say that there are some four hundred and ninety-three colleges in this country approximately, and some two hundred and twenty-nine thousand students are receiving instruction therein. Below we indicate some teaching characteristic of particular chairs in a number of universities, other than Princeton and Chicago. (Note: The initials used are arbitrary and are not to be taken as the true initials of the university or the professor. Definite information may be had for the asking.)

H. University: It may not be known that this University selects her preachers for specified periods. The Rev. Dr. X. (a Unitarian, if I mistake not) makes the following statement in a public address: "Old religious ideas hold their own as squatters." "They must be evicted."

Another quotation from H. University: "There are no absolute evils in life." Again, "The highest ethical life consists at all times in the breaking of rules of life, which have grown too narrow for the actual case."

Imagine the results of the application of this principle in an army of young men. Are we surprised at the result as shown in the record of the German Army?

B. University: Professor Y. says, in effect: "Moral notions grow out of customs." "They are figments of speculation—unrealities which should be discarded altogether." He remarks, also: "Pair marriages are produced by the condition of society and they are transitory." Also, in effect: "The majority vote makes the theory of right and wrong." "There is no such thing as a moral law of God!"

C. University: Professor Z. has said: "There can be and are holier alliances without marriage bond than with it." Also: "Every normal man and woman has room for more than one person in his heart" (as husband and wife).

L. University: Professor W. has said: "It is not right to set up a technical legal relationship" (in marriage) "as morally superior to the spontaneous preference of men and women." He cites the lawless license of John Stuart Mill and George Elliott as perfectly defensible.

S. University: It is to be noted that this is a co-educational University, at which the sexes are mingled. Professor E. has said, relative to the Decalogue: "It is unscientific and absurd." An astonishing feature connected with this gentleman is that he is occasionally invited to preach to young men and young women in the denominational pulpits of that city. He once said, whether in pulpit or class-room I cannot say: "When there is an unequal division of the sexes (more women than men) only one woman for one man as wife, as a proposition, is not consistent." In a lecture to a combined class of young men and young women he suggested with enthusiasm the doctrine of reincarnation as a possible defense of license in love.

N. University: Professor H. has said: "That the contemporary increase of divorce is a mighty process of spiritual liberation."

W. University: Professor R. has said: "Beliefs . . . become a barrier to progress—a shelter of superstition, etc." Also: "Moral incentives should be anchored to human nature, not masses of dogma."

R. University: Professor D. says: "That the peculiar boast of the Church was that it furnished a revelation of the will of God, and of God's doings in nature and history." (He refers to the books of the Old Testament). He continues: "The arrogance of this dogmatism is hastening the close of the second stage of religion."

N. University: Professor U. has said: "There was no handwriting of God on any Babylonian wall. The Medes and Persians rose and fell according to the laws of trade, etc."

Views such as these are always combined with the most radical form of religious unbelief in most particulars. The universal prevalence of divorce will be the least evil of those naturally the result of the acceptance of such heresies in religion and sociology.

The world of unbelief will be apt to quote these men, and others who might be named, as indicating the verdict and prevalent opinion of the entire faculties of these universities. But this is far from the truth. The Christian culture and depth of conviction of most of these faculties (as a whole) are represented, in fundamentals, by the answer of Liebig to Lord Kelvin. The latter asked Liebig if he believed the grass and flowers were originated by chemical forces. "No," said Liebig, "no more than I could believe that the books on Botany describing them originate from chemical forces."

But the really Christian gentlemen filling the chairs of these universities recognizing the fact that they are not professors of theology and Christian evidence usually confine themselves, in their class rooms, to their legitimate fields of thought. These infidel iconoclasts, however, found here and there in these chairs, with deplorable zeal, rarely miss an opportunity to destroy if possible the faith of the young men subject to their influence. These infidels are often able men, not infrequently magnetic and attractive men, and we can easily conceive of the fatal results of this system of culture among the young men of our colleges.

They do not always pose as absolutely irreligious. They have their own pet, sometimes complex and irreducible theories, which they consider superior in point of logic, beauty and power to the teaching of the learned and faithful scholars of the Christian centuries. They differ with Goethe, who once said: "If you have any faith, give me, I pray you, a share of it. If you have any doubts, keep them to yourself. I have enough of my own."

Of the four hundred and ninety-four institutions of higher learning, you can count those popularly known upon the fingers of your two hands. Many of the States have a single institution under the auspices of the Commonwealth. The remainder—an overwhelming majority—are entirely controlled by carefully selected Christian faculties with a learned and able clergyman or minister of the gospel in the presidential chair. In our own section of the country the University of the South is a conspicuous example. When the senior members of any family are selecting a place for the education of the youth entrusted to their charge, might it not be well to select an institution of this kind where the spiritual influences are strong and indisputable? In any event, it is high time that we should "wake out of sleep" and make these universities who tolerate such men feel the power of our Christian indignation. All honor to Princeton! Many other institutions follow her example.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

II. Difficulties to Be Overcome.

Before any better system of placing the clergy in their fields of labor can be put into practice, there are some serious difficulties to be met and overcome. One difficulty is the large number of vacant parishes and mission stations. Then, also, the frequent changes add to the difficulty, for vacant places, when filled, in many cases become vacant again. The number of vacant places is large. In some dioceses and missionary districts ten per cent and more of the places that might be filled are vacant. Our people generally, especially in the strong parishes, do not realize the great harm done by the many, frequent and long-continued vacancies in the smaller and weaker places. There is great need that these vacant places should be filled and kept filled. The efficiency of the work of the Church demands it. What would be the efficiency of our schools if ten per cent of them were closed. What would be the efficiency of railroads if ten per cent of their stations were closed? And post-offices and express offices and other public utilities, ten per cent closed; good business-like management requires something better. And so it should be in the Church.

And what is the cause of these vacancies? What is the remedy?

The apparent cause is want of means. The small parish is closed because it lacks the means to pay a proper salary to its rector. Bishops, especially Missionary Bishops, call for money in order to provide for the clergy that they have, and to secure other clergy for their vacant fields. Appeals are made for more money. Apparently, the cause of so many vacancies is the want of money. Many will give this answer. The real cause lies deeper than this. Want of money appears on the surface. To get at the real cause we must go deeper, examine conditions and see why it is that there is a want of the money needed. That more money is needed to properly support our clergy at work in weak places and in the missionary field is very plain.

An examination of conditions, however, reveals the fact that the trouble is much deeper. Small and weak places may be lacking in means to support their clergy, but the Church in this land has all the means needed to properly support all our clergy who will take active work. They should not, they do not, expect the large incomes to be had in other professions. But they ought to have a suitable living salary, and the Church in this land does have the means needed to give this, and much more, too. What is wanted is "a better system" for gathering the offerings of our people, wisely distributing the same, and wisely placing our active clergy in their several fields of labor. It can be done, and it ought to be brought about.

Want of means! Amazing. When undertaken in earnest, see eight and a half millions raised for the Church Pension Fund when only five millions were asked. Then for the War Commission of the Church, five hundred thousand asked, and six hundred thousand given. And our own Church people have been giving large sums, along with others, for Y. M. C. A. work and for Red Cross work. Our Church people in this land have the means. Under proper directions, and with an awakened interest, all the money needed can be obtained. It is not the ability to supply the needed means that is wanting. There are other causes, to be examined later.

Some years ago a writer in the Atlantic Monthly said: "The churches are not impoverished. They spend vast sums of money on buildings, organs, windows and music. The money needed to support the ministers is not lacking. It has simply been misdirected."

These words, meant for others than our own communion, apply also to us. The trouble is neither in a want of means nor in a dearth of clergy. A better system will correct both of these apparent evils.

ORIGIN AND EARLY HISTORY OF THE EDUCATION SOCIETY OF VIRGINIA.

Historical Address Delivered at the Theological Seminary in Virginia, June 6, 1918, by Mr. J. Holdsworth Gordon.

(Concluded.)

Well has it been said that from a pure fountain there will flow a pure stream. And we can well understand why the glorious story of this Society, and of its Theological Seminary, when we look to the character of the men under whose judicious and pious hands the work was launched. We can well understand why its life has been one of such usefulness and honor. Men of zeal, piety and executive ability, with but one object and purpose in view, and that the endeavor to make them effective as instruments in the spreading of the pure gospel of their Lord and Master. As the story of the success and glory of a nation may always be traced to the lives and characters of its founders, its pioneer workers, so may the success of any institution. And this is peculiarly so of the history of institutions like that of which we are speaking.

While it would be impossible for me, within reasonable limits, to pay homage and due tribute to all of those to whom the Society and the Theological Seminary are indebted for success and stability, I cannot close without a few words of those most immediately associated with their origin and early days. Three names stand prominently forth as a very part of their glory, as their real "Fathers,"—Reuel Keith, William H. Wilmer and Oliver Norris. In an interesting address delivered by Dr. P. P. Phillips, before the Alumni Association of the Seminary in June, 1915, tribute is paid to Dr. Wilmer and his relations to the Theological Seminary, in beautiful and appropriate terms. On the walls of old Bruton Church is a tablet upon which are inscribed the following words:

"In memory of the Rev. William H. Wilmer, D. D., whose eminent talents and exemplary piety enabled him to fill with dignity and usefulness the important stations of rector of this church, President of William and Mary College, President of the House of Clerical and Lay Deputies of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was beloved in private and respected in public life. A sound divine, a faithful pastor, a sincere and practical Christian."

This tablet was placed as a testimonial of the profound respect and ardent affection for Dr. Wilmer, not only by the people of his own Church, but jointly by Christians of other denominations. No words at my command can add to the beauty and glory of such a tribute.

The Rev. Oliver Norris, I am informed, was of Quaker ancestry, and surely he possessed the gentle traits and loving characteristics universally accorded that sect. I quote from the sermon delivered at his funeral by Bishop Meade. The preacher said:

"May I not, fearless of contradiction, ask of this congregation if there be any one among you that has not experienced evidences of his pastoral fidelity and tenderness? Who has ever complained of neglect there, where a people are so apt to complain? What individual so poor or so obscure but has received a full share of his pastoral kindnesses? Which of you, rich or poor, but affection beamed from his eye and spoke from his lips, and was felt in the warm pressure of his affectionate hands? . . . Which of you was sick, but he was soon at your side ready to comfort you, pray with you, and entreat you to take it in good part as the dispensation of God and, if there be need, to be your tender nurse? Which of you was ever in distress of soul, body or estate, but he was the first to condole with you and endeavor to make some spiritual improvement in your affliction? Which of his people departing this life, but he was with them, exhorting to due preparation and strengthening them for the conflict with the last enemy and great adversary?"

He must have been, indeed, a true follower of the gentle Jesus.

I have already referred to Dr. Keith, but his name is one of which we are so justly proud, a name loved by your people and by my people in common, belonging to both of us, that I must again speak of him. Dr. Keith is described as being tall and slender. His visage, complexion, eyes and hair dark. His memory retentive, quick and active. He ranked high as a preacher and had a very melodious voice. Another, speaking of him, said that while in the pulpit the subject of his discourse "seemed to absorb his whole inner man and control his outer. In mind and body he seemed magnetized, charged with gospel sentiment and emotion, love of Christ, benevolence towards men, zeal for religion and deep humility before God."

Such was the first rector of Christ Church Parish, and the head teacher of this Seminary in the days of its infancy.

I have spoken of the close relations that have ever existed between this Seminary and Christ Church Parish, and the fact that we at all times felt at liberty to call for help from its faculty when help was required. In this connection may I not refer to one of the professors of the Seminary in days gone by, the loved Dr. William Sparrow, whom I well remember as often officiating in our pulpit during my earlier days. Showing the close relations of Dr. Sparrow to our people, I find in the minutes of our Parish in 1874, at the time of his death, a record in which he is spoken of as "one whose name was among the honored ones which make up the roll of the regular pastors of the Church."

If there is any one here who remembers Dr. Sparrow, and there must be some one, he can bear testimony to his piety, his greatness as a scholar and preacher, and his undeviating faithfulness in the work of the Master. Bishop Brooks, that great Bishop of our Church, who was one of his students, says of him:

"My old professor and friend, one of the noblest and best of men I ever knew: learned and broad, and simple as a child. He was a splendid man: clear as daylight and fair and candid, without a particle of dogmatism."

And to his inspiration the Bishop declares he, in a great measure, looked with perpetual gratitude for the help and direction given his life. This address, if I may so dignify it, would be even more incomplete than it is if I were to close without reference to one of the laymen of our Church whose heart and service were given to the Society and Seminary in the earlier days and who remained a firm friend until he passed away, Francis Scott Key, one of the first vestrymen of our Parish, and one of the first managers of the Society. Filling a high position in public life, Mr. Key was a man of great political activity, and he was also most active in the affairs of the Church. He was a devoted and consistent Churchman. As the author of "The Star Spangled Banner," whose echoes are heard on every hillside and through every valley of our own beloved country, and are mingled with the martial strains of the hymns of the Christian peoples of the world battling for humanity and the right in foreign lands, his name is dear to every patriotic heart. And it is additionally dear to us as Churchmen, for his love of God and his love of his country both grew in one, as a very part of his life and nature. He was the author of our own beautiful hymn, which he is said to have written in 1823:

"Lord, with glowing heart I'd praise Thee

For the bliss Thy love bestows:
For the pardoning Grace that saves me,
And the peace that from it flows."

Few know Mr. Key as he really was. He was a layman, it is true, but in his life and his influence he was truly a "Priest of God." John Randolph, Virginia's gifted son, pays him the following tribute:

"He perseveres in pressing forward to do good to his unhappy fellowman. The result is that he enjoys a tranquility of mind, a sunshine of the soul that all the Alexanders upon earth can never confer or take away."

The friendship existing between these two distinguished men was close and tender, and the influence of the character and religious convictions of Mr. Key upon his friend most potential. In September, 1818, Mr. Randolph wrote to Mr. Key:

"Congratulate me, my dear friend. I am at last reconciled to my God, and have assurance of His pardon through faith in Christ, against which the very gates of hell cannot prevail."

In reply, Mr. Key writes:

"I do, indeed, my dear friend, rejoice with you. I have long wished, and often believed with confidence, that you would experience what God has now blessed you with. I need not tell you (if I could) of its value, for I trust you will feel it to be unspeakable. May the Grace that has brought you from darkness to light, from death to life, keep you forever. You stand on an eminence, let your light shine brightly that all may see it, steadily that they may know whence it cometh, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

What a veritable sermon is found in this exchange of views between two such great minds as these. What a rebuke to the weaklings of the world who in their madness declare that the religion of the gentle Jesus is one but for women, children and sentimentalists.

The Society was incorporated by the Legislature of Virginia by act passed January 8, 1875, having been to that time a voluntary Association, under the name "Trustees of the Protestant Episcopal Society in Virginia."

I have sought in what I have said to give an outline of the early history of the Education Society and the Seminary and a short story of those who were their promoters. A full history would fill many pages of the records of the Church. Their impression and influence and teachings have extended not only to our own country, but to foreign lands. The sons of this Seminary have gone forth unto the uttermost parts of the globe, carrying the message of their Saviour. Among her alumni may be found the names of Bishops and Priests who have expounded the gospel in its truest simplicity, but with a power given of God, men honored and beloved of all, with un-spotted escutcheons, unsullied reputations and sanctified names, worthy sons of a worthy mother.

In closing may I not express the sincere hope and heartfelt prayer that this loved Seminary, founded on the rock of true Godliness, and the love of Christ, may ever remain unshaken by the force of unrighteousness; that her beauty and her glory may remain undiminished by the lapse of time; that she may be the medium in the future as in the past of enabling many to reach the realms above; and that the Smile of Divine Commendation descending from on high may ever rest upon her, upon her sons, upon her laborers and upon her work.

LETTERS FROM TWO VIRGINIAN SOLDIERS.

The Hidden Peace.

Base Hospital, Camp Sevier, S. C.

* * * Speaking of peace, I have been wondering lately what that phrase in which so many of us have been steeped, "The Peace of God," means; what it means in the parlance of the day. Certainly nothing could be more peaceful than Virginia in May, as I have said, and yet that certainly is not "The Peace of God," at least not now. Then there is the peace of placid-mindedness, the great calm of introspective satisfaction; some of us live in it and others of us only feel it only once in a great while. And I do not believe that such is God's peace. Then I have heard of the peace of isolation, where life is a series of harmonious hours, far from anger and the sword, and from the things that clash and make fire. There was a time when men went apart into such a peace, and having ordered the things of their own lives to a peaceful conclusion, gave themselves up to dreams, and fondly imagined that they found the peace of God. Gradually, very gradually, because I was too far into the very heart of this great dream country, I have been making my way out of its pleasant pastures and through its scented woods, toward the shores where, from afar still, I think I have caught a glimpse of a land where there is to be found the Peace of great price. Like the pearl, it is hidden away, very difficult to find, and when we have found it all of us go and sell all that we have and buy it. Today the Peace of God is on the sword that strikes for righteousness; it is in the roar of the artillery that bellows for liberty; it is in the hand that forges the steel and fashions the sinews of war, that guides the plow straight through the furrow to victory for justice and humanity. The Peace of God has made of mud on the battlefield of Flanders for the sons of liberty a great cleanliness; of separation and suffering and sorrow a vast happiness; of sickness and disease and wounds a gentle healing, and of bitterness, even unto death, a living and triumphant sweetness. Today the Peace of God is a great war and in the measure in which we take our part, and in that measure only can any of us hope to have that peace. "Force, force, to the utmost force"—indignant, bruised, determined, armed and righteous force—we must get it, we must keep it, and we must be ready at all times to use it. That is what I have found out after two months in the army, and it is something very much worth while to me.

I do not remember that I have mentioned to you our prospect as to the big trip. I think we all realize the dangers to which we will be exposed, and yet I think we all are saying in our hearts like the Master said, "Let us go over unto the other side." You will remember how even while the storm clouds were gathering, Jesus made the proposal, and His disciples, although they must have known the great peril of the journey, readily assented.

"He sends us 'unto the other side,'
And He

Will be upon the ship to guide it true,

We shall not perish, we shall see the dawn—

Comrade, how goes the night with you?"

Lovingly,

JOHN.

A Letter to His Mammy.

The following is from a soldier boy in France, written to his old colored mammy when he heard of the death of her husband. This mammy nursed "her soldier boy" from the time he was one month old, and is still living in his home:

A. E. F., May 6, 1918.

Dear Mammy,—I just heard today that good old Johnson was dead, and I haven't had any news in a long time that cut me up so. Poor old man! Johnson was mighty good to me ever since I was a little boy, and I will never forget the days when he would play with me, make me playthings, give me watermelon, and up to the very time I left home old Johnson would do anything for me, and he was a real true friend. I am going to miss him when I get back home, and I know you miss him now, mammy.

Your oldest boy sympathizes with you with all his heart, and wants to help you in your trouble. I would give anything if it were all over and I could come back home. You have been mighty good to me, mammy, and many nights when I lie awake I think of all of you at home, who have put yourselves out to make me happy, and I can do so little for you.

If you want to make me real happy, just be there when I come back—the same good mammy who brought me up to come over here, and who, I believe, nursed me good enough to come back, and live through all this war.

Good-bye, mammy; take good care of yourself for your boy's sake. My heart goes out to you in the loss of your good husband, who was my devoted friend.

Your boy,

The Great Commission

A Striking Incident. "Why Should It Be Thought Impossible With You?"

The Rev. Dr. Ridgely, Dean of All Saints' Divinity and Catechetical School in Hankow, sends the following letter. It was written by a young Chinese in Paotingfu to a Chinese friend in Hankow:

"I want to write you about one of our local officers who is now in or around Hankow, in one of the military hospitals, I think. His name is Colonel Niu Hsiang Ch'en, and belongs to the Third Regiment of the Second Division of Chihli troops.

"His family live here, and his son studies English in the Y. M. C. A., but he has never had any time for Christianity. Just before Yochow was captured by the Southern troops, he was badly wounded in the leg, and was taken to the Mission Hospital there. According to a letter he has just written home, the night before the Southern troops entered Yochow he dreamed that a man stood by his bed and said, 'I am Jesus, and have come to warn you that if you do not leave this hospital immediately you will receive great harm.' He woke up and thought that it could not mean anything, as Christianity and Jesus were all a hoax anyway, but when he fell asleep again it was repeated, and then again the third time. As soon as daylight came he got up and though still hardly able to walk, told the hospital attendants he had to start home. They tried to prevent him, telling him that the foreign hospital was the very safest place one could be, but he persisted, and made his way out of the country. As you know when the Southerners entered the city that day, in spite of the American and Red Cross flags, they forced their way into the hospital and killed every man of the Northern wounded there. Niu was the only one who escaped. Now he has written for his whole family to immediately begin studying the Bible that they may become Christians as soon as possible. I have not been able to find out whether Niu himself has gotten connected up with the Christians in Hankow, but write to you to see that he is properly followed up. For a man who has had an experience like his must be destined for something extraordinary. Let me know what you find out."

Glimpses of Work Among Laymen.

Notwithstanding the great demands that the war is making on everyone, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew finds that men continue to be interested in the normal work of the Church and are ready to assume responsibilities in the parish. Sometimes a hesitancy to take up definitely religious work is encountered, but this should by no means be interpreted as indifference to the Church's appeal. It has been the experience of Brotherhood Secretaries that this hesitancy is due to a feeling of unpreparedness on the part of laymen.

At the invitation of the rector, Mr. Walter Miller Kalmey, Corresponding Secretary of the Brotherhood, recently met with about thirty men of Trinity parish, Pottsville, Pa. Representative business men, they were most cordial and hospitable, but they wanted to be "shown." Given an insight into a definite method for training and instructing men in lay work and they were eager to at once form a probationary chapter of the Brotherhood.

Invited to address the Church Conference of the Diocese of Harrisburg at Eagles Mere, when this same plan was presented, a half dozen rectors asked the Secretary to meet with groups of men in the parishes.

A day or two later found the Secretary at Trinity Church, Williamsport, where the rector had brought together about seventy-five men prominent in the life of the community, among them the mayor and ex-mayor of the city, all members of Trinity parish. It was here that the Brotherhood man had a most impressive experience.

As is generally known, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is made up of small parish units of carefully picked men. While it was a privilege and a joy to be a part of such a splendid gathering, it was with no little concern that the Secretary faced them with an appeal that should be given to only a limited number of men.

Unwilling to miss the opportunity an earnest effort was made to present the responsibility of all Churchmen for definite work in the parish. A deep spiritual tone was in evidence, and an appeal was made for a dozen men to band themselves together as the rector's aids in the spiritual work of the parish.

The meeting was brought to a close. About a dozen men seemed unwilling to go. Suddenly, as if born of inspiration, one of these suggested that we all go into the little chapel. Almost unconsciously they found themselves in the dimly lighted sanctuary, where the rector appeared in cassock at the altar rail. After a moment of meditation, they were led in a simple but wonderfully affecting and satisfying intercession.

It had stormed all evening. Outside the rain was being driven along in torrents, but so complete was the sway of something without themselves that inside there was an indescribable calm.

Resident Physician for Anvik.

The Alaska Division of the Bureau of Education has notified the Rev. John W. Chapman, of Anvik, of its willingness to station a physician at Anvik if our mission there can provide him with a residence. Such an arrangement would be of great advantage to the mission, since it would insure the presence of a doctor to care not only for the members of the mission staff, but for the children of the school and the people of the village and the surrounding country. At present our missionaries at Anvik are about 200 miles from the nearest doctor. There is an Indian population of about 400 within a radius of fifty miles. Dr. Chapman has already completed, with the aid of friends in this country, a small building for use as an infirmary. He is now anxiously considering the possibility of providing for the physician's residence. The Indians at Anvik have offered to do all the work of building the cabin without compensation.

To pay for the logs, provide the necessary hardware and other building material will cost approximately $750. Dr. Chapman has asked Dr. John W. Wood, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City, to receive and forward to him gifts for this purpose. He believes that many friends will see the wisdom of taking advantage of this opportunity at small cost to safeguard the health of our missionaries as well as of the Indian people at Anvik.

Church Intelligence

The Southern Student Conference at Blue Ridge, N. C.: This conference was held during the week ending June 23, with a total enrollment of about three hundred. This was a much smaller attendance than usual, owing, of course, to the smaller number of college men during the past session on account of the war, and the number that, for the same reason, have undertaken work during the summer. For the same reason the percentage of high school boys was larger than heretofore.

The leadership for Bible study, institute and platform work was of the usual high quality. Men like Dr. A. T. Robertson, of Louisville; Dr. Edwin Mims, of Vanderbilt; Dr. E. M. Potat, of Furman University; Dr. H. H. Horne, of New York, and Dr. Winfield Scott Hall, of Chicago, conducted daily classes throughout the ten days, as well as sharing in the responsibilities of the platform hours. Special platform speakers were Dr. Harry F. Ward, now to be professor of ethics in Union Theological Seminary; Dr. O. E. Brown, of Vanderbilt, now in the Army Y. M. C. A., and Dr. Robert E. Speer. Mr. G. B. Winton had charge of the foreign students, of whom there were seven.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Summer School for Sunday-school Workers.

The third annual session of the Virginia School for Sunday-school Workers was held at the University of Virginia, June 10 to 14.

Owing to the war and other conditions it was questioned whether the school could be a success. Other schools of like nature feared to make the venture. The Diocesan Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Virginia, however, determined to make the attempt. Though the number in attendance was not as large as usual, it was the unanimous opinion of those present that it was the most successful session ever held.

The school was opened Monday at 8 P. M. with divine service and addresses of welcome by the Rev. J. Francis Ribble, D. D., representing the Diocesan Board of Religious Education, and Mr. E. I. Carruthers, the University. Mr. R. E. Anderson then made an address explaining the program, and telling the aims of the school, at the conclusion of which registrations were made and classes assigned. Each day's work was commenced with service and Holy Communion in St. Paul's Church.

The program called for earnest and constructive work and the efficient faculty was at its best. Dr. Forrest, of the University of Virginia, lectured on the Wise Men and Their Methods, the Book of Proverbs, the Book of Ecclesiastes and the Book of Job. These lectures were most enlightening and inspiring both to the Clergy and the Laity. Dr. S. A. Wallis, of the Theological Seminary of Virginia, lectured on the Prayer Book and Church Worship. His lectures were practical, instructive and interesting, and had the desired effect of deepening the love of all for the old Mother Church and her wonderful liturgy.

The faculty for Sunday-school workers was as follows: Dr. S. U. Mitman, Ph. D., and Mrs. Randolph Watkins on Religious Pedagogy; Mrs. E. E. Osgood, the Old Testament and Biblical Geography, and Miss Sallie Deane, the Gospels and the Life of Christ.

In all these courses examinations are had and units given towards certificates and diplomas by the General and Diocesan Boards of Religious Education.

The Summer School is growing in interest each year, and as soon as its benefits are thoroughly known and appreciated, it will prove a mighty factor in adding to the efficiency of schools throughout the Diocese.

Emmanuel Church, Brook Hill: Bishop Gibson visited this church on June 9th, and confirmed a class of seven.

On June 30, Mr. Percy J. Knapp, Brotherhood of St. Andrew's Secretary at Camp Lee, delivered a very helpful and interesting address on his work at the camp. Mr. Knapp spoke at St.

James Church, Richmond, on the same Sunday night.

Emmanuel Church has instituted the practice of ringing the bell for prayer every day at noon until the war is over.

Grace Church, The Plains: The Rev. Edmund L. Woodward, rector. This new and handsome church was consecrated by the Bishop of the Diocese on Friday, June 28. A full account of the interesting services will be given next week.

The Richmond Clericus has adjourned for the summer to meet again on Monday, September 2.

A patriotic service was held in St. Paul's Church, Hanover, on Sunday, June 30. The service flag of the congregation with seven stars, one representing the former rector, Rev. Wm. Byrd Lee, was hung in the chancel. The Home Guard attended in a body and marched in while the Marseillaise was played on the organ. Familiar hymns were sung instead of the chants, and a patriotic sermon was delivered by the Rev. R. Cary Montague. The church was packed to the doors.

Summer Rest, the vacation home for self-supporting women at Greenwood, Va., was opened July 1. The place is owned and run by the Episcopal Church, and is supported by subscribing members of the organization and by the small board paid by the working women who take their vacation here. Church people are asked to contribute once a year to this admirable institution. All contributions may be sent to Mrs. S. M. Sarvey, Treasurer, Retreat for the Sick, Richmond.

Summer Rest also needs a Ford. If any one would give a second-hand machine in good condition, or a new machine, it would be greatly appreciated, or contributions may be sent to Mrs. E. E. Osgood, Brook Hill, Va., or the Rev. Dr. J. W. Morris 1131 West Avenue, Richmond, Va.

Mrs. W. A. Powers,
Manager of Summer Rest.

NEW JERSEY.

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop.

Summer School.

The inaugural session of the Diocesan Summer School for Clergy was held in Ruth Hall, Asbury Park, from Monday to Friday, June 17 to 21, those in attendance being from the Dioceses of New York, Pennsylvania, Toronto and New Jersey. The program comprised three lectures each morning and one each afternoon, with conferences on three evenings. There were daily celebrations of the Holy Eucharist and Matins and Evensong. The Rt. Rev. Irving Peake Johnson, D. D., of Colorado, gave four lectures on "The Holy Spirit in the Church," and a conference on "Prerequisites to a Successful Priesthood." The Rt. Rev. Frederick J. Kinsman, D. D., of Delaware, gave three lectures on "The War and Christendom," and Dean Fosbrooke, of the General Seminary, four on "The Book of Isaiah." Five lectures on "The Efficient Priest" were given by the Warden of Seabury Divinity School, the Rev. F. F. Kramer, D. D. Conferences were conducted by Mr. G. Frank Shelby on "The Brotherhood and War Work," and Mr. Ralph Adams Cram on "Church Architecture."

The idea of the school originated with Bishop Matthews, who, with the concurrence of the Trustees, made Ruth Hall available for the occasion. The first session has proved so successful it is desired to have annual sessions, and the Bishop has appointed a Continuance Committee comprising representatives from different Dioceses interested.

Asbury Park is most appropriate and convenient for such occasions, and is likely to be the permanent place of meeting.

Renovation of Ascension Church, Gloucester.

On the evening of St. John Baptist's Day the Bishop of the Diocese consecrated the new chancel which, with other important improvements, has just been completed in the Church of the Ascension, Gloucester City, the Rev. Carroll M. Burck, rector. The preacher on the occasion was the Rev. F. F. Kramer, D. D., Warden of Seabury Divinity School. Certain of the eight diocesan clergy present assisted in the service, and there was a large congregation of people in attendance. Beside the spacious and dignified chancel several new windows are among the gifts. The cost was approximately five thousand dollars, and only a small debt remains. The plant is complete, comprising church, parish house and rectory, and the parish is in good spiritual and financial condition under its devoted rector.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. E. P. Dandridge, rector of St. Paul's Church, Petersburg, has been accepted as chaplain in the United States Army and will leave shortly for the Chaplains' Training School at Camp Taylor, Louisville, Ky. Mr. Dandridge is a graduate of the University of Virginia, Oxford University and the Theological Seminary in Virginia. He has been rector of St. Paul's Church for seven years, and is greatly beloved not only by his congregation but by the people of Petersburg generally. During the month of July the Rev. Robert C. Jett, D. D., will have charge of the services at St. Paul's, after which the Rev. Herbert Osborn, of Elizabeth City, North Carolina, will serve as rector pro tem.

The Rev. Pembroke W. Reed has resigned St. John's Church, Petersburg, of which he has been rector for about eight years, and accepted the rectorship of Trinity Church, Aurora, Diocese of Chicago. He will leave for his new field in a few weeks.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

Training Camp at Paris Island.

Editor of the Southern Churchman: May I ask that any of your readers who may know of Churchmen now in training at the United States Marine Training Camp, Paris Island, S. C., will kindly notify me of the fact, giving full name and company number when possible, that I may get in personal touch with them and offer the ministrations of the Church?

There are at present about eight thousand men at the camp. Among these, I have already secured through the chaplain the names of approximately four hundred Episcopalians, and expect the list will soon reach at least six hundred; but I cannot be sure of guarding against omissions unless the people at home communicate with me.

I am endeavoring to visit each man, and to keep a record of the information he gives concerning his home and church relationships. This information is copied in triplicate, and one copy is sent to the Brotherhood of St. Andrew for the Honor Roll of the Church.

I also send a card to the parent and rector of each man telling them that the Church is in touch with their boy. These cards seem to be highly appreciated, judging from the letters I have received. I mention these details of my work in the hope that they may be suggestive to other ministers engaged in camp work.

Ambler M. Blackford.

Address me St. Helena Church, Beaufort, S. C.

The Rev. Christopher Innis LaRoche, rector of St. John's Church, Johns Island, for the past five years, has resigned to accept the call to return to his old parish of eleven years in the Diocese of Washington (Zion parish).

KENTUCKY.

Rt. Rev. C. E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop

Bishop Woodcock left on June 25 for his summer home at Leland, Mich., where he expects to spend the summer in a much needed rest. He did not take a vacation last summer, and feels the need of the deserved recreation, which it is hoped he will find in that invigorating climate.

Dean McCready, of Christ Church Cathedral, has also started on his vacation, which will be spent in the East. The Cathedral shows splendid improvements, both materially and spiritually.

Death of Mr. Ballard: Great distress is felt over the death of Mr. Charles T. Ballard, who had been senior warden of the Cathedral for the past five years. Mr. Cushman Quarrier, who had been junior warden, has now been made senior warden, and Mr. J. W. E. Bayly has been elected junior warden. Mr. Bayly has been Secretary of the Chapter of the Cathedral for a long term of years, and this promotion was very deserved. Mr. S. Thruston Ballard was elected a member of the Chapter to take the place of his deceased brother.

The Rev. Alexander Miller was ordained deacon in Christ Church Cathedral on June 12. As a lay reader, Mr. Miller had served Trinity Church at Fulton, Ky., for over a year and during the past three years has been a student at the Virginia Theological Seminary at Alexandria, Va. He was placed immediately in charge of St. Thomas' Mission at Bardstown Road and Richmond Avenue, Louisville, and took charge of that work on July 1. Dean Emeritus Craik has been in charge of this Mission since it was taken over as a Diocesan Mission. This is a growing part of the city, and a wonderful opportunity for development.

The Rev. H. S. Musson, of the Church of the Advent, Louisville, has left to spend his vacation at Toronto, Ontario. He expects to be gone about two months.

The Rev. L. E. Johnston, rector of Grace Church, Louisville, who has been incapacitated by illness for the past three months, has shown splendid physical improvement lately, and is now able to resume full charge of this important parish.

The Rev. Clinton S. Quin, formerly of the Diocese of Kentucky, who has been elected Bishop-Coadjutor of Texas, was born and raised in Louisville. His wonderful enthusiasm, aggressiveness and capabilities have long been known in this Diocese, and it is no surprise to his intimate friends that he has been chosen a Bishop. It had been predicted that he would eventually attain this distinction, and it was a splendid satisfaction to his friends to have it come while he was still a young man and in full possession of his vigor.

KANSAS.

Rt. Rev. James Wise, D. D., Bishop.

Associated Missions: One of the many plans that Bishop Wise is developing for an increased activity in the Diocese is the Associated Mission. The Church in Kansas has a very attractive center in Topeka, where it owns a twenty-acre plat of ground just a few squares from the capital. On this ground is the Cathedral, which was just completed about a year ago, the parish house, the deanery, Bethany College for Girls, Wolf Hall, the Bishop's house of seventeen rooms and a barn. It is the barn that is making one of the dreams of the Bishop's come true. The carpenters, plasterers and painters are fast converting this rock barn into an Episcopal residence. This gives the Bishop a chance and a place to try the associated mission idea. The Bishop's house will be the home for the Archdeacon of the Diocese. Five rooms will be cut off for him. The rest of the building will be fitted up for the young men who will come to the Diocese in the future. Here they will spend a year or two helping at the Cathedral, at the colored parish, visiting Christ Hospital and then reaching out to small towns near Topeka by train or motorcycle. This will give the men a very practical and varied experience. The present members are Messrs. Hawkins and Whittle. Mr. Hawkins has been elected as the canon of the Cathedral. Mrs. George H. Muller will be the house mother. Her husband was the Rev. G. H. Muller, Chanute, Kansas.

An Every Member Canvass was made on the sixteenth of June of Calvary Mission, Yates Center, R. Y. Barber, minister-in-charge, with good results. It was the first canvass and the people received many proofs that it is the only method to finance a church. A hundred and fifty dollars were pledged for extension work. The people have not been contented to give, they want work to do, so on the second Sunday in each month they will visit the Woodson County Home for the Aged and hold a service for the few patients. One of the patients had been playing two double records on a victrola for over four years. He has twenty-five double records now.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Rev. John G. Martin, of Clifton, who has filled an appointment as Y. M. C. A. Secretary, in charge of a building in a French village near Chalons, upon the coming of his successor, returned home. His work was almost entirely among the French soldiers who made the village a place of rest during service in the trenches and found in the building the only place where they could come together to find a stove through the hard winter, and Mr. Martin speaks of the patience and devotion of the French soldiers with the greatest respect and of the work of the Y. M. C. A. and Red Cross as properly deserved.

The Rev. Edgar W. Anderson, who went last year as Y. M. C. A. Secretary to Russia, upon the discontinuance of the work, has returned home; intending to take other war work in the service of the government.

The Rev. Allan Greene, of Massachusetts, has accepted the call to St. Johns', West Hoboken, to take charge in the early autumn.

The Rev. W. V. Filkins has the satisfaction of making the new rectory his home; an excellent piece of work for the church at Arlington to have accomplished.

The newly formed Board of Religious Education is entering upon its work with large plans to stimulate interest not only in the Sunday-schools, but in education beyond the schools, in district unions, in working with the Diocesan Men's Club for candidates for the ministry and in other ways.

Sixty of the Sunday-schools have now pledged themselves to the support of the Bonnie Brae Farm, a home for homeless boys.

Mission of Help: In connection with the War Service Commission and on account of the general conditions made by the war, a Mission of Help has been organized in the Diocese, and very capable women have been chosen to conduct this work.

The Rev. Chapman S. Lewis, of South Amboy, N. J., has accepted a call to St. Stephen's Church, Jersey City, to begin work in the early autumn.

The Rev. Henry B. Todd, of Trinity Church, Paterson, has accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Hoboken, to begin his work in the early autumn.

The Rev. John C. Donnell, of St. Thomas' Church, Newark, some time in Y. M. C. A. work at Camp Dix, is giving most of his time to work with Rev. Karl M. Block and Rev. Warren L. Rogers at St. George's Chapel, at the camp named.

The Rev. George M. Plaskett, the faithful minister of the two colored churches, Epiphany, Orange and Trinity, Montclair, has been elected a member of the Newark Board of Diocesan Missions and Church Extension.

BETHLEHEM.

Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, D. D., Bishop.

The annual summer school of the Diocese of Bethlehem was held at Bishopthorpe Manor, Bethlehem, from Monday, June 24 to Friday, June 28. There was a good attendance of Clergy. Bishop Talbot and Dean Fosbrooke conducted conferences with the Clergy. Mr. Alfred Edward Bailey, director of Religious Education at Worcester Academy, delivered a course of lectures on the Geography of the Holy Land. Dean Fosbrooke gave a course on the Historical Writings of the Old Testament, based on 2 Samuel 9:20. Dr. Arthur Gray delivered lectures on "The Church in the Caribbean." Miss Julia Williamson gave a course in story-telling.

The Rev. Clarence Wagner, who was to have taken charge of the Church of Faith, Mahanoy City, during July, will be in charge of Trinity Church, Carbondale, during that month. The Rev. Richard M. Doubbs will soon take charge of St. Paul's Church, Minersville, and St. Stephen's, Forestville.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

"White Star Hospitality Service."

As the gate port to the war front, New York city is being made a great hospital center. Already it is found that many enlisted men, whose homes are in distant States, are ill in New York, compelled to undergo operations, injured while on transports, brought back wounded from France. Fathers and mothers in such numbers began to ask about hotels, about hospitals, about maps and expenses, that the Institute of Applied Christianity, 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, New York, has formed a volunteer White Star Hospitality Service. It controls two host-houses and automobiles, and desires to be of service to parents of enlisted men who are ill. Every feature of Christian hospitality is offered, of course, without thought of charge. Where parents find it impossible to go to New York to be with sick sons, responsible and sympathetic men and women are ready to act in parents' stead, and desire to be called on through the institute service.

The service gets its name through a new hospitality feature which automobile owners of New York have adopted. It is the display of an emblem, as is done in the case of the Red Cross, upon the windshield or lamp of cars, signifying that the car displaying it has taken for a health ride a sick enlisted man, or is willing to do so. The emblem also shows that the owner of the car is willing to be hailed by boys in uniform, strangers in the city, and asked for rides, either at the time or as may be arranged. Car owners who are members of the Hospitality Service are sending their cars by arrangement to hospitals to take convalescent boys for rides. The emblem consists of a white star on a bright blue disc, the whole surrounded by a blue circle. The words "Hospitality Service: Army and Navy" appear. Membership in the service is $1, and the emblem is furnished free. Of course, it can be displayed by cars everywhere provided they agree to perform the work required, and membership will be granted to car owners in any city or town, upon receipt by the institute of the $1 fee, with a promise to do the work involved. This service co-operates with the Red Cross and other war agencies. Already many parents in many States have been served by the New York White Star Service.

The Institute of Applied Christianity has at present about one thousand men of New York churches, under instruction to do Christian work. They are business men and professional, and, of course, work on Sundays and week nights without pay. It is estimated that 225,000 American boys now in France did when at home some form of Christian work in churches, or civic work in cities and towns. The institute is now forming a New York White Star Legion composed of trained volunteer workers among laymen of all churches to take the places of men gone to the front. New York State has passed a law against slackers—that men be not permitted to stand around and do nothing. In view of present conditions in churches, shortage of ministers, and even greater shortage of volunteer laymen, many New York laymen themselves say that churches like States may well adopt and enforce laws against Christian standers around: men who go to Bible classes and gain knowledge, go to church and get sermon zeal—and then go away and forget both. The institute has text book and definite and practical course of instruction, and it is from among some of these institute students that the White Star Hospitality Service, serving parents whose enlisted sons are ill, has been formed, and depends on for success.

Old Synod Hall, in years gone by an orphan asylum, is to be used for dormitory. The Cathedral trustees offered for war purposes all parts of their close, and even asked whether the foundation of the nave might not be used. This foundation is a vast concrete floor, on a level with the Cathedral floor, and stretching away from the present western front many feet wide and broad nearly to Amsterdam Avenue. The need was for students in Columbia University Summer School, who are taking special courses in war work. These are enlisted men, not private citizens, and are in technical training.

The government considered the Cathedral offer, and reported finding the old hall almost ideal. Few changes were needed, and not fewer than one hundred and fifty men can be accommodated. This hall stands directly south of the Cathedral, and in it for several years the Diocesan Convention met. Eventually it is to be torn down, of course. During the General Convention of 1913 the exhibits were made there.

Captain John H. Findlay, Twenty-sixth Battalion Canadian Infantry, three years in France, and speaking in several churches under direction of the National Security League, insists that the war cannot be won, no matter how many men America sends abroad, unless and until the American people themselves make sacrifices. As yet he says they have made no sacrifices whatever, as compared with those of England and France. He points out that British casualties on the French, Italian and Palestine war fronts now run 35,000 a week, killed, prisoners and wounded, and that Americans must begin to expect some such numbers. Already hundreds of wounded men are being brought back from France, and while their homes are in the West and South, many are kept in New York for treatment. Hospitals in number and size such as America never saw before are completed. Captain Findlay urges churches to provide men to visit these hospitals, and men and women to respond to appeals of the Red Cross, which is calling loudly for help. The Home Section of the Red Cross, co-operation with the Charity Organization Society, has more than nine thousand cases of destitution of families in Manhattan and the Bronx alone owing to absence of bread-winners in the war. These serious conditions, certain to grow worse, Captain Findlay insists America must wake up and face.

MISSOURI.

Rt. Rev. D. S. Tuttle, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. F. F. Johnson, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, who has served most acceptably for six months as voluntary chaplain at Jefferson Barracks, Mo., by appointment of the Bishop-Coadjutor of Missouri, has now been commissioned a Chaplain in the National Army with the rank of First Lieutenant, and assigned to duty at Jefferson Barracks.

Chaplain Dorrance is a graduate of Harvard and of the Episcopal Theological School, and has made a splendid record with the officers and the soldier boys at this army post. He came to Missouri from the rectorship of Central Falls, R. I.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

Special Council Elects the Rev. William Mercer Green Bishop-Coadjutor.

The Special Council for the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor met in St. Andrew's Church, Jackson, June 25, at 9:30 A. M. The morning session was occupied with the necessary business before the election. Bishop Bratton fixed the Coadjutor's jurisdiction as "the northern counties above the A. and V. railroad and the southern counties below that railroad to become sole charge of the Bishop-Coadjutor, in turn, for a one year period in each division, the Bishop being in sole charge of the other portion for a like period. The Bishop reserves the acceptance and oversight of candidates for Holy Orders, and the appointment and direction of Archdeacons." The Coadjutor's salary was fixed at $3,600.00, and it was decided that the present 75 per cent increase in assessment should remain on the Diocese until such a time as the endowment could be begun.

In the afternoon the balloting began. Very few nominating speeches were made. The Council was anxious to get to the balloting and the possible candidates were well known. It was patent from the first that both Orders in the Council wanted a Diocesan man, and that the majority of the lay order wished Mr. Green, of Jackson. The Laity elected Mr. Green on the second ballot, after which the vote fluctuated very little. Only two men outside the Diocese were in nomination. At the end of the seventh ballot, when concurrence seemed hopeless, prayers were said for guidance. The eighth ballot was fruitless, but on the ninth, some of the Clergy changing their votes, Mr. Green was elected.

Thirty-one of the thirty-two Clergy entitled to vote were present. The Bishop asked to be excused from voting. Twenty-two parishes, a constitutional quorum, were present, with twelve missions. The balloting was as follows:

Ray—First ballot, Rev. William Mercer Green, 10 1-3; Rev. Albert Martin, 3 2-3; Rev. G. Gordon Smeade, 4; Rev. C. E. Woodson, 1; Rev. E. S. Gunn, 3; Rev. J. L. Sykes, 3 2-3; Rev. W. P. Witsell, 1. No election. Second ballot, Green, 15 2-3; Martin, 2 1-3; Smeade, 4; Sykes, 4 2-3. This ballot elected Mr. Green by the Laity. There was little or no change in the succeeding lay vote.

Clerical—First ballot, Green, 10; Martin, 5; Sykes, 1; Woodson, 2; Dakin, 2; Gunn, 1; Walter Mitchell, 1; Smeade, 8. Second ballot, Green, 12; Martin, 3; Sykes, 4; Woodson, 1; Dakin, 2; Smeade, 7; Witsell, 1. Third ballot, Green, 12; Martin, 4; Sykes, 3; Woodson, 1; Dakin, 2; Smeade, 7; J. H. Boosey, 1. Fourth ballot, Green, 14; Martin, 3; Sykes, 3; Woodson, 1; Dakin, 2; Smeade, 6; Boosey, 1. Fifth ballot, Green, 14; Martin, 3; Sykes, 3; Dakin, 2; Smeade, 8. Sixth ballot, Green, 12; Martin, 2; Sykes, 3; Dakin, 2; Smeade, 10; Woodson, 1. Seventh ballot, Green, 10; Martin, 5; Sykes, 1; Smeade, 8; Woodson, 1; George B. Myers, 1; Haskell DuBose, 4. Eighth ballot, Green, 14; Martin, 4; Sykes, 1; Smeade, 8; DuBose, 3. Ninth ballot, Green, 17; Martin, 3; Sykes, 1; Smeade, 3; Woodson, 1; Robert W. Patton 1; DuBose, 4.

On the ninth ballot of the Laity Mr. Green also received fifteen votes, and was elected by the concurrence of both Orders. On the motion of Mr. Martin the election was made unanimous.

Mr. Green is a Mississippian, born in Greenville, Miss., where his father, the Rev. Duncan Green, was rector of St. James Church, dying there during a yellow fever epidemic. The Bishop-Coadjutor-elect is the grandson of Rt. Rev. William Mercer Green, first Bishop of Mississippi. He has spent his entire ministry, with the exception of two years, in Mississippi, being at present rector of St. Andrew's Church, Jackson. Mr. Green is forty-two years of age. He is a graduate in arts and theology of the University of the South, and has twice represented his Diocese in the General Convention.

SOUTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. H. L. Bursleson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. P. Remington, D. D., Suffragan

Annual Convocation.

The Annual Convocation of the Missionary District of South Dakota was held on Saturday, Sunday and Monday, June 15th, 16th and 17th. The actual business of the District could be finished in one day, undoubtedly, but in such a district where distances between missionaries are great, and many men seldom see a brother clergyman, it means much to have several days of informal visiting and conferences.

A most welcome guest was the Rev. Charles L. Pardee, of the American Church Building Fund Commission. To many who knew nothing of the work of the Commission, his message was of the greatest interest, and all were given a new and bigger realization of the large work it is doing in the Church.

A resolution of greeting and a pledge of hearty support was unanimously voted to be sent to President Wilson from the Church in South Dakota.

The most important business done was the division of the District into deaneries. In such a large State as South Dakota, with its many small towns and only one clergyman for two or three counties, and its many communicants living where there can be no regular services, the deanery system will be a valuable attempt to meet the problems thus created to properly care for the scattered Church folk. Three of these deaneries have already been established—the Rosebud Deanery, with its center at Dallas, and the Rev. W. B. Roberts as Dean; the Southern Deanery, with its center at Yanktown and the Rev. E. F. Siegfried as Dean; the Northern Deanery, with its center at Aberdeen and the Rev. F. B. Bartlett as Dean. The Central Deanery, with its center at Mitchell, awaits organization until fall.

Another important piece of business was the unanimous passing of the resolution originally passed by the Diocese of South Carolina in regard to Christian Unity. The only change in the wording of the resolution was the including of the Committee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, to which to send the resolution in addition to the Commission on Unity of the National Council of the Congregational Churches and our own joint Commission on Christian Unity.

On Sunday the preacher at the morning service was the Rev. W. H. Anthony, of Pierre, and in the evening there was a special Litany said and addresses on "The Church and the War," by the Rev. F. B. Bartlett, Dean E. B. Woodruff and the Rev. Paul Roberts.

Mr. C. D. Rowley was elected Treasurer of the District, and the Rev. Paul Roberts, of Brookings, Secretary.

The Bishop's banner for the Church school giving the largest per capita offering to General Missions through the mite boxes was presented to the Church school of Grace Church, Huron, with an offering of $3.26 per child.

Consecration of St. Paul's Church, Brookings: On Wednesday, June 19, the new church at Brookings was consecrated by Bishop Bursleson. Mr. A. E. Winegar read the "Request for Consecration," the Rev. W. B. Roberts read the "Sentence of Consecration," and the Very Rev. E. B. Woodruff preached a splendid sermon from the text, "This is none other than the House of God; this is the Gate of Heaven." After the service St. Paul's Guild served luncheon in the basement of the church to the congregation, and short talks were given by the Bishop, Dean Woodruff, the Rev. Paul Roberts, the Rev. W. H. Anthony and Dr. Slagle.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop.

Ordinations: On June 23, the fourth Sunday after Trinity, Howard Rasmus Brinker and Charles Glenn Baird were ordained to the diaconate, and the Rev. Morton Joslin and the Rev. Rowland Frederick Philbrook advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Thomas, assisted by the Clergy in attendance at the eleventh Annual Convention of the Missionary District of Wyoming, held in Christ Church, Douglas.

The sermon was preached by the Rev. S. A. Huston, of Cheyenne. Mr. Brinker was presented by Mr. Huston, Mr. Baird by the Rev. Samuel E. West, the Rev. Mr. Joslin by the Very Rev. D. W. Thornberry, and the Rev. Mr. Philbrook by the Rev. Paul B. James.

Mr. Brinker is in charge of Christ Church, Douglas. Mr. Baird is doing summer work in encampment, and expects to return to the Philadelphia Divinity School for his senior year. Mr. Joslin and Mr. Philbrook continue in their present work, the former at Kemmerer and the latter at Glenrock.

MONTANA.

Rt. Rev. W. F. Faber, D. D., Bishop.

Election of a Bishop-Coadjutor.

The Convention of the Diocese met in the Church of the Holy Spirit, Missoula, on Sunday, June 23. The Bishop's address gave an encouraging account of the condition of the Diocese, notwithstanding the disturbed times.

At the close of the first day, the Bishop asked the Convention to grant him a Suffragan, to whom he intended to assign the eastern half of the Diocese, with the purpose of its early development into a new Diocese. The Convention granted the request. On Tuesday morning the Clergy elected on the first ballot the Rev. Granville Gaylord Bennett, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Great Falls, and the Laity confirmed the election. Mr. Bennett is rector-elect of St. Paul's Church, Minneapolis, and the decision will involve difficulties for him; he asked for ten days in which to consider the question, before sending in his answer to the Bishop.

Mr. Bennett is a graduate of the University of Nebraska and of Seabury Divinity School (1907) and his entire ministry has been spent in the West.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

WAR MOURNING.

Editor The News Leader:

The Southern Churchman of June 8 has a most timely editorial on mourning on the part of those bereaved by the war. After speaking of Dr. Bowie's sermon and the bill introduced in Congress for its abandonment, President Wilson's letter to Dr. Anna Howard Shaw, president of the Woman's Committee of the Council of National Defense, is quoted in full. This approves the wearing on the left arm of a three-inch black band, with a gold star for each soldier entered into life. Thus, we show our Christian hope in that heaven where our loved ones shall "shine as stars forever and ever," Dan. 12:3.

Truly,

(Deaconess) MAY SHEPPERSON.
Lakewood, N. J., June 16.

We publish the foregoing because we are glad to see that people, and especially Church people, are really thinking on this subject.

Bishop-Coadjutor Reese, of Southern Ohio, has prepared a special ritual to be used at memorial services for members of congregations who have been promoted by death from service in this world to service in the spiritual world.

The ceremony includes the changing of the blue star in the congregational service flag to one of gold as better representing the one who has passed on, and is entirely of a triumphant nature, having no trace of grief in it, but emphasizing throughout the great teaching of our Saviour on this subject that He was the conqueror of death and had changed it so that instead of an ending of life we should look upon it as but life's beginning.

This form was used at St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., recently in commemoration of a splendid young man who went from that congregation and met with an accident while flying over Pensacola Bay.

The family attended the service without mourning, and with a courageous bearing that is an example of Christian faith and patriotic inspiration to the whole country, and will do much to bring about a new attitude toward the separation from those who go before.

As Whittier so beautifully expresses it:

Who hath not learned in hours of faith
The truth to flesh and sense unknown,
That Life is ever Lord of Death,
And Love can never lose its own.

PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD WILL TOWARD MEN may not be so far distant as the roar of cannon would lead us to believe.

A practical league of nations to preserve the peace of the world is almost certain to be one of the results of the present world struggle.

Commissions both in England and in France have already been appointed to consider the details of such a plan.

Viscount Grey, former Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs in the Asquith cabinet, has issued a very interesting pamphlet on this subject. After reviewing some of the difficulties to be overcome, he lays down certain essentials to the establishment of such a world combination as follows:

First, the idea must be adopted with earnestness and conviction by the executive heads of States. It must become an essential part of their practical policy, one of their chief reasons for being, or continuing to be, responsible for the policy of their States. They must not adopt it only to render lip service to other persons whom it is inconvenient or ungracious to displease. They must lead and not follow. They must compel, if necessary, and not be compelled.

This condition was not present before the war. To what extent is it present now? It is not possible to answer this question fully, but it can be answered certainly and affirmatively as regards President Wilson, the executive head of the United States, and this alone is sufficient to give new life and purpose to the idea of a league of nations. President Wilson and his country have had in this matter the great advantage of having been for more than two years and a half, before April, 1917, able to observe the war as neutrals, free from the intense anxiety and effort that absorb all the thought and energy of the belligerents. They were able not only to observe but to reflect and to draw conclusions.

One of the conclusions has been that if the world, of which they form an important part, is to be saved from what they consider disaster, they must enter the war against Germany. Another has been that if national liberty and peace are to be secure in the future there must be a league of nations to secure them.

After emphasizing the necessity of completely overthrowing the militarists of Germany, he concludes with these significant words:

The establishment and maintenance of a league of nations such as President Wilson had advocated is more important and essential to secure peace than any of the actual terms of peace that may conclude the war. It will transcend them all. The best of them will be worth little unless the future relations of States are to be on a basis that will prevent a recurrence of militarism in any State.

"Learn by experience or suffer" is the rule of life. We have all of us seen individuals becoming more and more a misery to themselves and others because they cannot understand or will not accept this rule. Is it not applicable to nations as well? And, if so, have not nations come to the great crisis in which for them the rule, "Learn or perish," will prove inexorable? All must learn the lesson of this war. The United States and the Allies cannot save the world from militarism unless Germany learns her lesson thoroughly and completely, and they will not save the world or even themselves by a complete victory over Germany until they, too, have learned and can apply the lesson that militarism has become the deadly enemy of mankind.

It should be the duty of every clergyman, as a moulder of public opinion, to cultivate and develop this plan for permanent peace. In no way can they do more to bring about the ideals of the Master.

JOHN BARLEYCORN'S CASE.

Judges tell me, Mr. Barleycorn, that you bring a third of the grist to the criminal court mill.

Doctors are my authority that you occupy three times your rightful share of indigent hospital beds.

Statistics prove that you contribute a larger number to the inmates of insane asylums than any other one force.

I have quoted life insurance figures which indict you, Mr. Barleycorn, of leading strong men such a rapid pace that you drop them into their grave long before other men who are strangers to you go to their last sleep.

About a third of all the homicides who are brought to trial plead that you had so befuddled their brains they were not responsible for killing somebody.

Sad indictments, Mr. Barleycorn. Now, what have you to say in your own defense?

"I paid to the United States last year 247 million dollars of taxes," Mr. Barleycorn replies. "That is by far the biggest sum paid by any industry in America."

And what else do you do?

"Employ 55,000 persons in 4,400 liquor and malt establishments in this country. And I make products worth 375 million dollars in a year."

On that tax proposition, Mr. Barleycorn is right. He pays a bigger tax than anybody else upon the value of his products. Having conceded that, let me open another page of the record.

I find by the United States census report that in the State of Pennsylvania Mr. Barleycorn in one year by taking products worth fourteen million dollars and by turning them into beverages which fill the cup that cheers he added just ten million dollars to their value.

What does that prove? It proves that the profit made by Mr. Barleycorn is very great.

You can see what I mean when I put it this way: The malt and liquor industry in Pennsylvania adds $10 in value to a crude product worth only $14.

Leather takes $24 and in manufacture adds only $7. Other factories take $7 and add $3 by making shoes.

The carpet mills add $9.25 to raw materials worth $23. The furniture factory puts a little more than $4 to lumber worth $8.

Even candy is not worth twice as much as the ingredients that compose it, and iron and steel are worth only double their raw state.

You will notice that whatever good or bad Mr. Barleycorn has done for us he has not failed to make us pay a fancy price for his services.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Sixth Sunday After Trinity: The Book of Deuteronomy consists, on the face of it, of addresses delivered by the great Law giver in the wilderness on the eve of the entrance into the Promised Land. It contains both prospect and retrospect. Looking backward, it reviews the people's past, summing up the Divine purposes in the discipline to which they had been subjected and seeking to arouse a sense of gratitude toward the giver of all good for their redemption from Egyptian bondage and their guidance in the wilderness. Looking forward to the time when they should have effected their entrance into Palestine, it stresses for them and their children the necessity and blessedness of obedience: "These are the statutes which Jehovah thy God commanded that ye might do them in the land whither ye go to possess it." There is nothing that recently emancipated slaves want to hear less about (and the same is true of their children) than obedience. It is associated in their minds with slavery. But how many Christians, it may well be asked, look forward to a heaven in which there is to be a perfect obedience to those laws of God revealed to us in this transition stage of being, this wilderness between our redemption from worse than Egyptian bondage and that kingdom which is righteousness first and then peace and joy in the Holy Spirit (Rom. 12:17)? The truth in Righteousness is to many a system of restraint rather than an inspiration and a joy; as was the case with those Scribes and Pharisees whom our Lord denounces in the Gospel for the day.

The second lesson is keyed to the same thought, quoting indeed this very Deuteronomic chapter (Deut. 6:4, 5, and Mark 12:29, 30), adding, however, that it is only through the Son of God that God is revealed as lovable or man made love.

The evening lessons were selected (topical course) with reference to this same truth of Collect, Epistle and Gospel, the necessity of inward, heart religion. It is something attainable only as God "pours it into our hearts," and also through the adoption on our part of the Cross as the law of life: "That like as Christ was raised from the dead through the glory of God the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life." Hence the story of the institution of the Holy Communion.

But note that even the Sacraments themselves may be reduced (and often are) to a system of legalism which leads only to a law of restraint, the righteousness of scribe and pharisee which we must "exceed"; surpass in quality, not necessarily quantity, in order to effect an entrance into the kingdom. The "blood of Christ" must circulate in the veins of our souls (John 4:34; 6:57; 1 John 1:7).

It was with this in mind that Amos

9 was selected for first lesson. The Lord standing by the Altar, in the mouth of the prophet, means something more even than "Real Presence" as commonly understood. It means the preaching of the word of righteousness, ruling out the often suggested antithesis between "preaching" and communion.

Wayside Sunday-schools in Korea.

Hundreds of Sunday-schools in Korea have started in the following manner:

A missionary well supplied with brightly colored pictures or text cards goes to some village and sits under some tree or by the side of the road. Very soon one child and another gathers in front of him to examine him and hear what he has to say. The missionary says a few words and perhaps sings a verse or two of "Jesus Loves Me," and gives each of the children a card, and tells them to come again next Sunday and bring others. Next Sunday he comes to the same place, and the children are there to meet him. A few will perhaps spell out with him a verse or a text. Some Sundays later the children will learn to look for his coming, and the class will take on regular proportions, and quite a number will join shyly in the singing. It may be that a child or friendly neighbor will offer his house, yard or room, and from that time more or less regular work may be begun. Some "schools" we have seen have met Sunday after Sunday through a long, bitter winter under a tree by the roadside, but the good done was not to be measured. Since these schools started only a few years ago thousands and thousands of children have been reached. Just the other day a Korean said, "It is curious that when I used to go to such and such a village the children sang all sorts of heathen songs, but now I only hear 'Jesus Loves Me.'"

First the children, then the home and then the church. This is the story in thousands of cases in the Orient. Such work is part of the rising tide of Sunday-school interest as promoted by the World's Sunday-school Association.

He Beat Me Home.

When for a little walk we went,
On errand or on pleasure bent,
As we drew near the vine-clad gate,
My always-present walking mate
Would slip his chubby hand from mine
And, toddling on past shrub and vine,
Would turn and say, with baby wit,
"I beat 'oo home, a 'little bit!"

God was so good to him and me
As to permit our lives to be Like those of two frank, boyhood chums
Together solving life's hard sums.
I, as the elder, sometimes knew
Where in his path lay bog or slough
So I might point it out in time
To save him from the fall and grime.

To-day some kind friends came and spoke Gently to me. And then awoke
A slumbering memory of Them:
I dreamed he was a babe again;
That he before my feet had sped
To reach our door a step ahead—
Through trembling lips I whisper it,
"He beat me home—a little bit."

Discarding Christianity.

Jack Graham was very much excited as he met his minister.

"After twenty centuries of Christianity's teaching peace on earth," he cried, "most of the Christian nations of the world are now busily engaged in shooting down their fellowmen! If that is all Christianity can do, I am through with it."

"Just what are you going to put in its place?" inquired the minister.

"I don't know; but I want something better than that!" declared Jack, fiercely.

"Let me see," said the rector. "Whatever unfaithful adherents practice, Christianity says that moral qualities are of supreme consideration. It exalts honesty and purity, and declares that the highest goodness is the unselfish giving of one's self for others' good. When you discard Christianity, will you be satisfied with a lower standard, Jack?"

"Of course not!" said Jack. "No one would ever be satisfied with the lower after he had seen the higher."

"Well, when you discard Christianity, where will you find a higher ethical teaching than that?"

Jack stood looking at the minister. "Well, sir, I must confess that there isn't any," he said. "It isn't the ethical teaching of Christianity of which I complain."

"Well, let us look deeper," the clergyman continued. "Christianity declares that at the heart of the universe is love; that a being of love surrounds us always, eternally seeking entrance to our lives, that He may bless us and help us. All we need is to let Him in, and, however weak we are, we shall become strong; however despairing we are, we shall be filled with courage; however broken-hearted, we shall know the deepest joy. Tens of thousands of the most intelligent of every age since Christ bear united testimony that exactly that has been their experience. Will you be satisfied with a religion that does less than that? Can a man ask any religion to do more than that?"

"Why haven't twenty centuries of that religion made war impossible?" cried Jack.

"If your physician left you medicine for some illness, and as soon as the physician's back was turned you pitched the medicine out of the window, and you steadily grew worse, could you justly say that the medicine had failed and you needed something different?"

Jack stood thinking it over. Then he held out his hand to the clergyman. "I am properly ashamed of myself," he said. "We don't need a different religion. We need only to live the religion that we have."—The Youth's Companion.

Woman's Auxiliary vs. Local Guild.

Recently, in a Southern parish, a debate was held that would seem to offer more than home interest. That a local Guild is more vitally important to the parish than is the Woman's Auxiliary was the premise offered. The negative side won.

We reproduce, in slightly abridged form, one of the papers on the winning side. It has occurred to us that perhaps some of our readers would care to turn over the pros and cons of the matter in their own minds.

Resolved, That a local Guild is more vital to the parish than is the Woman's Auxiliary.

I uphold the negative of this assertion and will present facts to convince you that a local Guild is not more vital to the parish than the Woman's Auxiliary.

By a local Guild is understood an organization formed for work within the parish or within the community where the parish is located. The Daughters of the Holy Cross is an example of such a Guild.

What is the Woman's Auxiliary? The full title of this society will tell its purpose. Its official name is the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society of the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States of America. The purpose of the organization is the salvation of the world. Upon each member of the Woman's Auxiliary is the three-fold obligation of prayer for missions, study of missions and giving to missions. An Auxiliary is an ally or an aid. The Board of Missions is that body of men representing the whole Church of America, which directs the mission work of the Church. The Woman's Auxiliary and the Board of Missions are allies in the world war for Christ.

Every baptized woman may be an individual member of the Auxiliary. Then there is organization on parochial lines under the direction of the rector, and on diocesan lines under the direction of the Bishop. All organizations work with the Board of Missions.

Vital means essential to life: Is the local Guild of the parish more essential to the life of the parish than is the Woman's Auxiliary? No.

Why not?

Because the work of the local Guild is narrower than that of the Woman's Auxiliary. To the work of the Auxiliary there is no barrier of race, clime nor creed. The world is the field.

It will be argued that charity begins at home. What is your home? If you were in Europe and were asked where your home is, would you mention a town or a State? Would you not say America? A Christian should say that he is a citizen of the kingdom of Christ, that is, of the world, which is his rightful kingdom.

It is said that we must work for our neighborhood. Who is your neighbor? Do we not preach the brotherhood of man? Can I confine myself to saying that my neighbor is Mrs. Jones, my community ward one? Am I not bound to say the world is my home, and every man my neighbor?

Seeing that the scope of Auxiliary work is practically limitless, how does this make it more vital to the parish than the work of the local Guild? Consider the effect on the individual members of the Auxiliary. Where a woman works her interest follows. She becomes by virtue of her work in this broad field a woman of far-seeing vision, of breadth of mind, of largeness of heart, not merely a community mother, but a world mother.

In this parish we have the Woman's Auxiliary and the Daughters of the Holy Cross. Every member of the Woman's Auxiliary is a member of the Daughters of the Holy Cross, while about one-third of the Daughters are Auxiliary members. Is that an argument for the superior charms of the Daughters? Not at all. It means this—the woman with the breadth of vision to see the need for work afar sees all the more clearly the need for work at home, and does both. This keenness of vision, this far-sightedness must be a vital part of the parish. It is the eyes of the Church, as it were.

The second reason why we believe that the local Guild is not more vital to the parish than the Woman's Auxiliary is that the work of the Auxiliary is more educational than that of the local Guild.

A parish society prides itself on its sending young persons to college, and too much cannot be said in praise of this work. The Auxiliary does this, too, and goes even farther. It helps to establish and support whole schools, kindergartens and colleges. The pupils trained in these schools are not to be counted on the fingers of two hands, but form an army of educated workers.

Another phase of the educational program of the Auxiliary is the obligation of every member to study. This means study the work of the Auxiliary and therefore of the Missionary Society of the Church. There must be no working in the dark; every member must keep herself informed of the progress of the kingdom of Christ.

The third phase of the educational program of the Woman's Auxiliary is the careful provision made for training children and young girls. At baptism a child becomes eligible to the branch of the Auxiliary called the Little Helpers. Under the direction of the woman's branch these children work till they are eight years of age; the girls from eight to twenty-one are trained in the Junior branch. At twenty-one the young woman, with years of education in the Auxiliary behind her, enters the Woman's Auxiliary ready for its duties. The woman trained from the cradle in the service of Christ, educated by the Auxiliary, working intelligently and assisting in the education of others, becomes a vital part of the parish. Such women are the brains of the Church.

Finally, the local Guild is not more vital to the parish than the Woman's Auxiliary because the work of the Auxiliary is more spiritual than that of the local Guild.

This is true in three ways. First, the work of the Auxiliary is more unselfish than that of the local Guild. Good as the work of the local society is in its philanthropic enterprises, it nevertheless partakes of self-interest. It is something like paving the street in front of your own house, or mending the neighbor's fence to keep the chickens out of your garden. Your own surroundings are improved by it. But sending a box to a minister in Oregon cannot partake of self-interest in any way.

As a second claim to greater spirituality in the Auxiliary than in the local Guild I present for your consideration the subject of prayer. The local Guild as a body indulges in prayer at its gatherings, and some of its members pray for the work of the society, but there is no special obligation upon the members to give their prayers. They are not taught to pray specifically for their work. Prayer is a prime requisite of Auxiliary work. Every member counts prayer as a regular portion of her work, just as much as study and gifts.

This is a practical age. Results are what people ask for, not prayers alone. For those who demand the practical result we affirm that prayer produces such results for the reason that prayer produces zeal, and your work follows your zeal. Prayer is something that anybody can give; it is a tool with which you can work when you can do nothing else. You may be too poor to give money, too busy to study or to work, but you can always pray.

Again, the work of the Woman's Auxiliary is more spiritual because of its higher aim. Always before the members of the Auxiliary is the magnificent goal of winning the world for Christ. The local Guild sets for itself tasks of healing the sick, clothing the naked, educating young women, and a number of other splendid tasks. The Auxiliary does all of these things, but always with the definite aim of bringing souls to Christ, the highest aim on earth.

Have we not here the story of Martha and Mary repeated? Martha, eager to serve, but cumbered with many cares, chained to earth by her material mind, while Mary sits at the feet of her Lord, drinking in the wine of life, her spirit rising above earthly cares?

Some contend that any claims to superior spirituality by the Auxiliary are offset by the great amount of practical good accomplished by the local Guild. Here the Auxiliary answers that it accomplishes a great deal more of practical good than the Guild because of its superior organization and its co-operation with the Church.

Keeping before them always the spiritual side of their work, praying without ceasing for the accomplishment of their glorious aim, cannot the women of the Auxiliary claim that they are the soul of the Church?

Now to summarize: We believe that the local Guild is not more vital to the parish than is the Woman's Auxiliary for the following reasons:

I. The work of the Woman's Auxiliary is broader than that of the local Guild, producing in its members a far-seeing vision that entitles them to the name of "the eyes of the Church."

II. The work of the Auxiliary is more intelligent, stressing education for its members, producing a body of thinking women who may be called "the brain of the Church."

III. The local Guild is not more vital to the parish than the Auxiliary because the Auxiliary work is essentially spiritual, both in aim and practice, thereby becoming of "the soul of the Church."

With eyes to see, a brain to think, a soul to feel, the Woman's Auxiliary must be more vital to the parish than any mere organization of women.

"Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."—John 15:13.

"On Flanders' fields where poppies blow,"
The dead are lying, row on row—
Beneath the poppies bending low.

Our dead are lying!
Gone for aye—
From life to death in but a day!
God grant to us that while they sleep,
Their memory we may ever keep.

From death to life,
Oh, rather say!
That while they walk the higher way,
We may within our hearts recall
It was for us they gave their all!
Ah, God! How can such wonder be?
Such sacrifice to set men free!
'Twas thus Thy blessed Son did give His all that we, Thy sons, might live!

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

War Savings and Children's Summer Clothing.

The Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor issues the following interesting and helpful bulletin:

Mothers are asked to do many sorts of necessary saving because of the war. Some sorts of war saving require special watchfulness on the mother's part to guard the children from possible harm. For instance, food substitutions must be made with great care in order that the children's food may still contain all the elements necessary to growth. But with clothes in summer it is different. In hot summer weather it is a distinct advantage to the child's health to be dressed lightly. And the saving of textiles and leather is an important consideration now. Wool must be saved because it is needed for the blankets, underwear and uniforms of our fighting forces. Cotton is needed for hospitals and many other uses. The need to supply leather for the army's use is of course imperative.

In selecting fabrics for clothing it is not entirely a matter of finding a cheaper and less needed substitute. Old goods must be brought again into service, turned, cleaned, washed, dyed and made over. When an old garment is returned to usefulness actual saving of wool or cotton is effected, and in addition manufacturers will be able to concentrate their output on goods for army uses because of the decreased demand for unnecessary materials. The purchasing of novelties, fancy fabrics and elaborate garments tends to withdraw from war uses not only needed materials, but labor, especially skilled laborers needed for other branches of production.

Now in summer large savings of woolen materials of every sort, including fancy and light-colored wools used for knitting, can be accomplished. Children can be clothed practically entirely in cotton for several months to come. Wise mothers will make children's summer clothing as simply as possible, thus reducing the work required for washing and ironing, and increasing the child's comfort. Children like to wear barefoot sandals in summer. Their use saves leather and stockings. Half solving and mending makes shoes go much farther. Further saving of leather can be effected by using canvas shoes in summer.

The publications of the Children's Bureau on the care of children will be helpful to mothers in the solution of the puzzling problem of clothing children in summer. The Children's Bureau of the United States Department of Labor, Washington, D. C., will send these pamphlets free of charge upon request.

FAVORITE HYMNS.

VIII. Just As I Am.

This beloved hymn is the work of Charlotte Elliott, an Englishwoman. Miss Elliott was an invalid all her life, a fact that invests the familiar lines with pathetic interest. As a sympathetic writer has remarked, each of her hymns is a chalice in which she has preserved, for the consolation of other sufferers, the fruit of her own prolonged affliction. "Just As I Am" was first published in the Invalid's Hymn Book, about eighty years ago. Today it is the great rallying cry of the Christian evangelist all over the world, and a part of the spiritual life of nearly every Christian household.

"In the course of a long ministry," said Charlotte Elliott's brother, "I have been permitted to see some fruit of my labors, but I feel that far more has been done by a single hymn of my sister's."

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bidd'st me come to Thee,
O Lamb of God, I come.

Just as I am, and waiting not
To rid my soul of one dark blot,
To Thee, Whose blood can cleanse each spot,
O Lamb of God, I come.

Just as I am, though tossed about
With many a conflict, many a doubt,
Fighting and fears within, without,
O Lamb of God, I come.

Just as I am: Thou wilt receive,
Wilt welcome, pardon, cleanse, relieve;
Because Thy promise I believe,
O Lamb of God, I come.

Just as I am, Thy love unknown
Has broken every barrier down;
Now to be Thine, yea, Thine alone,
O Lamb of God, I come.

The Power That Marks a Man.

Every observing man, as he goes through life, must finally come to the conclusion that the most important acquisition in life is self-control; he finds himself admiring, not the repose that comes from inaction, but that which comes from fulness of vitality and faith controlled, held in bonds of reason and good manners. This is a storehouse of power. Not only in public effort, but in the privacy of the home and the superficial intercourse of society, the element that ministers most effectually to peace and success is self-control.—Selected.

As Others See Us.

Sometimes a joke, coined merely for the sake of amusement, proves a keen little sermon in itself. The Columbia Jester gives us the following:

Jones: "My wife's been nursing a grouch for the past week."

Brown: "That so? Why, I didn't know you'd been sick."

A Dutch Lullaby.

Far over the water so blue and deep
The little Dutch babies are going to sleep;
Bright yellow tulips are nodding their heads
And fluffy young ducks are safe in their beds,
While slowly the windmills go whirling around—
Go whirling around—go whirling around.

Far over the water the sails are furled
And the stars peep out on a sleepy world;
The moo cows moo softly beneath the trees
And the white sheep drowse in the evening breeze,
While softly the windmills go whirling around—
Go whirling around—go whirling around.

Far over the water comes down the night,
Fading and fading the silvery light;
White storks on their nests stand white and tall,
And over the treetops the shadows fall,
While softly the windmills go whirling around—
Go whirling around—go whirling around.

The Book He Bought for an Egg.

By Mary S. Stover.

Little Plum was a happy boy as he trudged along the narrow, dusty road that had been worn down by the travel of thousands of years till it was less like a road than a deep ditch between the fields. Clapsed tightly in Little Plum's two chubby hands was an egg.

He did not see anything strange in going to the village with a smooth, fresh egg to spend instead of a cash, or, as we would say, a cent. In China grown people as well as children often go shopping with only an egg or two for money.

Little Plum had meant to go straight to the man who sold sweet cakes, but he stopped to see why there was such a crowd at the end of the street. He squirmed through between the legs till he was quite inside the circle, and then he was so frightened that he almost turned and wriggled back again! Instead of that, he hid behind the long coat of the old village schoolmaster and peeked shyly around at the strange man with a very white face who had drawn this big crowd.

The man did not look or dress like the people Little Plum knew; and his Chinese didn't sound the way people talked in this part of the country. A younger man with a jolly younger face repeated what the stranger said in words that Little Plum could understand.

"Listen, people! This is a good teaching. I heard something about it when I was in Peking," said the old schoolmaster proudly. "The young man is a scholar of the new sort, from one of the mission schools. His honorable family live in the village that Hang Po came from. The white man's family live far, far away. You ignorant country people have no idea how far it is. Even I have never been there."

The schoolmaster made a polite bow to the strangers, who bowed and thanked him in the long flowery way that is Chinese good manners. After that the young man sang a song that Little Plum liked very much, though he couldn't understand just what it meant. Then they uncovered a pile of books, and the younger man took some on his arm.

"Buy one of our books, good people! You will be made happy by what is in even the very littlest ones that I sell for one egg each."

"Truly those are beautiful books, though they have no pictures in them. My cousin's family have a book with pictures in it; but they need the pictures more than we do, because my honorable father can read," thought Little Plum proudly. At that moment the crowd parted a little, and the boy caught sight of the man who sold sweet cakes.

"Sweet cakes are good. But when I have eaten one up it is gone, and so is whatever I paid for it," he told himself. "A book would last a long time and give pleasure to others as well as to myself. It would please my honorable father most of all, because he can read; and a good boy ought to think more of his father than he does of himself."

So Little Plum turned his back on those tempting sweet cakes and thrust his egg almost under the nose of the young man with the books. He could take a book from somebody with a friendly yellow face like his own, but he would never have been brave enough to get so close to that other man.

Think of it, the young scholar stopped and smiled straight at Little Plum! "Is it a present for your honorable father?" he asked; and the boy nodded shyly.

"What a fine present I can make with what I myself should have eaten up before this!" Little Plum told himself as he hurried home along the dusty road. "Indeed, this book is a present for myself, too, and for all who come into our house, because my honorable father can read it aloud while all sit on the floor or on the kang and listen. What a wise boy every one will say I am!"

But nobody at home seemed to think he had done a wise thing. "No book that costs only one egg can be worth much. Those men should be punished for fooling little boys!" said his father.

"The young man said there are stories in it! And the schoolmaster said those are good things the men tell," urged Little Plum, who was almost ready to cry at seeing how little they thought of his book.

"There, there, you meant well; and the honorable father knows that you are a good son to buy a book instead of something for yourself," whispered his mother.

"Ah, the schoolmaster was there, was he? Did he see you buying this? It is well that he should know how much even the children of my insignificant family desire to possess books. I will look the thing over when we have eaten," decided Little Plum's father.

He did. Everybody had to keep very still, because it is a great task to read a Chinese book; and Little Plum's honorable father seemed to read very slowly at first. But soon he was reading faster, and he looked as if he had indeed found good stories in the little book.

Of course Little Plum wished that his father would read aloud, or else tell that what the book was about. But it would not have been polite to ask him, and at last Little Plum had to go off to bed without being sure whether it was an interesting book or not!

Long, long afterward he was wakened by hearing his mother calling to his honorable father: "Do come to bed; it is the middle of the night, I am sure! Has that foreign devil's book bewitched you?"

"No! The man who came to bring this book to our country is a good, good man! I have been reading of One who was a greater sage than Confucius. This man was a friend to every one—even to children and to women like you. In the morning I must read to Little Plum how this Jesus took children up in His arms and blessed them. It is a wonderful, wonderful book!"

"My, oh, my! I'm sure it is worth an egg!" whispered Little Plum to himself.—Sunday School Times.

Doll Cousins.

"May I go down to the other house, mother, and play with the little girl there? She's just as big as I am, an' her name's Bessie."

"How d'you know?" interrupted Ned.

"'Cause she told me. She was standing by the stone wall, seeing our trunks come, an' we told each other our names. An' I told her that our father had bought this land an' built this house for us to live here summers, an' she said that she lives here all the time an' that her father takes care of our father's land. 'N' then I asked her who did she have to play with, 'n' she said she had two dolls, 'n' their names are Prudy an' Polly. Can I take Margaweeet an' go over there, mother?"

"Yes, Ruth, if you'll be sure to be polite."

"O, Mother Bell!"

"Yes, I know, dear, that you're not rude, but I want you to be particularly careful. I want you to promise not to say or do anything that can hurt her feelings."

"I'll promise, mother," answered Ruth earnestly, little thinking how soon she would be put to the test.

With her beautiful doll, Marguerite, in her arms, she ran down the lane, finding Bessie on her doorstep, with her two dolls beside her. Dolls? Corn-cobs! That is just what they were, corn-cobs with ink marks for eyes, nose and mouth. Corn-cob dolls were the only dolls little Bessie had ever owned. One of these had a red handkerchief pinned around it for a shawl; about the other folds of white cotton were tied with a faded pink ribbon. A queer feeling of surprise seemed to go all over Ruth, but before even the least little bit of it crept into her eyes Ruth remembered. "O, aren't they dear?" she cried. "I never saw any before. Did you make them? Let's play my dolly is their cousin come to visit them. There, Margaweeet," she added, putting her doll on the steps beside the others, "you're introduced; now get 'quainted."

Bessie's shy little face suddenly brightened, and a happy comradeship had begun.

Sometimes Ruth carried Prudy and Polly, while Bessie bore, with tender admiration, the beautiful Marguerite. Sometimes the dummies were carried by their own little mothers; but always there was the happy sharing, making glad the long summer days.

Then one day, when the maple leaves were turning red, a wagonload of trunks went from the big house to the station, ten miles away, followed by a carriage with the Bell family. There were good-bys and good-bys till the carriage turned the corner, and then Bessie ran off to the barn. She meant to have a good cry all by herself, but her mother's voice called: "Bessie, Bessie, come and see what there is for you in this big box."

Bessie, running back, lifted the cover wonderingly. There was a beautiful new doll, exactly like Marguerite, except that her eyes were blue and Marguerite's were brown. There, too, was a complete outfit of pretty clothes, even more and lovelier than those of Marguerite. A little note from Ruth to Bessie was pinned to the doll's dress. It read: "This doll is for your very own, to be another cosen to Prudy and Polly. Her name is Pearl, and she will be cosen to Margawee, too, so they'll all be cosens; and when I come next summer we will have perfectly lovely times, just as we did this year."

It would be hard to tell which little girl was the happier, the one that wrote the note or the one that read it.—Sophia T. Newman, in the Standard.

For the Southern Churchman. Flowers and Stars.

If all the stars were flowers
How sweet the sky would smell!
I'd run and hold my hands out
When they fell.

Would they have thorns, I wonder?
Would they be hard to hold?
I know they would be scalloped,
All of gold.

It may be that the angels
Lean from their place, afar,
And think each earthly flower
Is a star.

A Hero of Fourteen Years.

Perhaps the most dramatic and heroic act of this world war was the noble self-sacrifice of a mere child of fourteen years. An Alsatian Boy Scout whose father had been killed in Alsace offered his services to the colonel of a regiment near Altkirch. Knowing every path, mountain trail and road, brave and intelligent, he was accepted.

During many weeks he rendered valuable services, bringing information enabling French progress and capture of prisoners. One day the colonel asked him to make a longer and more perilous quest than usual. Our young hero started, full of zeal and hope, and was allowed to take his dog Fidele. Having to sleep out for two nights, he knew his dog would not betray him.

All went well for a long while, though the journey was full of perils. Suddenly two burly Prussians barred his path, and he was taken before the enemy officers in charge of the nearest post.

Asked his name, "Karl Webler," he replied. "Where do you live?" "With my mother at Altkirch." "Your father?" "Killed?" "You bear a German name and speak German. Why are you helping the enemy?" "I am Alsatian and love France, my motherland." "Stupid young fool," said the officer, "do you know your fate—a spy?" "Yes, sir." "Do you love your mother?" "With all my heart." "Very well. You love your mother, and you would like to live. I will let you go and give you one hundred francs if you will tell me how many regiments and how many batteries are defending Altkirch." "No, sir, I cannot." "Why?" "Because I promised never to betray my country." "Idiot!" The officer then said: "I will give you five minutes. Accept my generous offer, or you die." The fateful minutes finished. "Well?" "Sir, I cannot and will not betray my country."

A few minutes afterwards the little hero and his faithful dog were dead. The story was related by a prisoner who witnessed the scene.

The widowed mother, now childless, broken-hearted, but proud, points to visitors the two medals sent her by the French Government—"La Medaille Militaire" and "La Croix de Guerre."—Edward Fox Sainsbury, in Our Dumb Animals.

Bettie's Basket.

Sidney Snork, Pudacah, Ky.

Mrs. Willard was sitting on her shady front porch one morning, sewing.

"There goes Bettie with her little basket," she said to her sister, and stopped her work to smile and wave at a little girl in a ruffled pink gingham dress. "Bettie's quite a familiar figure in this town; everybody knows the child because she goes on all of her mother's errands and never without that little wicker basket. Sometimes it is flowers, sometimes fruit that she carries. She is on her way now, I think, to the King's Daughters Hospital, to carry some of her mother's pretty flowers."

Bettie was, indeed, carrying flowers to the hospital, but Mrs. Willard was not able to guess how very unwilling she was to go. All had been well until she had passed a group of children playing on a front lawn. They all stopped their play and started after her. "There goes Bettie with her little old basket," one of them sang, tauntingly. "Bettie and her basket," teased another. "Does Bettie want her basket?" grinned a little freckled-face boy wickedly.

Bettie, by that time, was on the verge of tears. "Oh," she said to herself stormily, "I'll never, never, never take this horrid little basket again. It just makes everybody laugh at me."

The next morning her mother said, "Bettie, dear, I have a number of errands for you this morning. Take some of this bright golden-glow up to the hospital; then take a glass of grape jelly to old Mrs. Perkins, and, as you come back, leave these magazines with Cousin Sallie. Your basket will be quite full this morning, will it not?"

Bettie did not reply; she had already decided to leave the basket at home.

A few moments later, when she was ready to go, she stopped in the door of her mother's room. "I'm ready to go, mother."

"All right, dear. But where is your basket?" Mrs. Brown asked.

"I—I'm not going to take it," Bettie answered, slowly. "I don't think I'll need it this morning."

Mrs. Brown looked surprised. "Oh, but you will need it, I'm sure. You can't manage without it."

Something told Bettie that she really would need the basket, but she remembered the children's laughter and left it behind. For a time she managed very nicely, but the magazines under her arm began slipping, and it was not easy to jerk them back and keep a firm hold on a glass of jelly in one hand and a loose bunch of flowers in the other. More than that, the wind was blowing her hat backwards. She almost wished for the basket; then she remembered the taunts of the boys and girls. Suddenly her hat blew off. She turned quickly to run after it, and of course dropped the magazines. Trying to catch the magazines, she dropped the flowers. She began to wish heartily for the despised basket. Her hat was dusty and her flowers were scattered over the walk. She herself was very close to tears.

Fortunately for Bettie, a friend of her father's came along at that time and smilingly restored the flowers and magazines, arranging them so that she could carry them more easily. She finished her errands without further mishap, but of one thing she was sure—quite sure—next time she would not scorn the faithful little basket!

Christianity and Religion.

Christianity is not a religion, and any one who classifies Christianity with the religions of the world is either ignorant or premeditatedly false. Christianity could not enter a congress of religions, because it could not recognize the paganism which dominates the religions of the world.

The religions of the world are the evaporations of their dead founders. Christianity is the life of Jesus Christ in the life of the regenerated man. Christianity is Christ in action. Consequently, it is the only dynamic which gives power, force and permanence to one's life.—Dr. M. A. Matthews.

SECURITY AND SERVICE

Forgive and Forget.

In life there are many things to remember and many things also to forget. Some of the latter matters are things to forgive. We have all been sinned against. Others have willfully misunderstood us, wantonly attacked us, secretly defamed us, meanly interfered with the successful issue of plans we had honestly and intelligently laid for the progress of God's cause. Then there have been many disagreeable experiences in life, which it is of no manner of use to live over again, even in thought. Oddities and incidental or accidental failings of others are to be forgotten, too. On the other hand, our friends will need to forget and to forgive things wherein we have injured them. No man living on earth has ever dealt with exact and complete justice—or at any rate sympathy—with all others. Humanity is weak at best, though for the most part we like to think that the wrongs it perpetrates from time to time are due more to ignorance and lack of vision than to badness of heart. Forget, then, the past or remember it only long enough to shed over it one hot tear and to mark in it what may be better done in the future or never again done while the world lasts.—Zion's Herald.

Wanting to do right will amount to little, unless we decide to do it.—Ex.

"They shall be mine, saith the Lord of Hosts, in that day when I make up my jewels."

MR. HENRY CLAY NEVITT.

Entered into the rest of the people of God at his home, Huntington, Fairfax County, Va. HENRY CLAY NEVITT, one of the first day of February, 1918, in the eighty-first year of his age. He was one of the leading citizens of "Lower Fairfax," where he was born and spent all his life, with the exception of the stormy period of the Civil War, when he stood up with all loyal Virginians for the principles dear to their native State and the whole Southland. His career as a soldier was soon cut short, for he was numbered among the first captives who fell into the hands of the Federal Army, and was incarcerated in the Old Capitol Prison, Washington, D. C., where so many of his friends and fellow-citizens were held in durance, while longing with all their soul to be with their brethren in arms on the front of the Confederate lines.

Mr. Nevitt was one of a large family, a son of "old Dr. Nevitt," as he was familiarly called, the faithful and beloved physician for a long period in that part of Fairfax County. His own brother, Dr. N. B. Nevitt, who died some years ago, succeeded to the honored place their father had held so long in the affections of the people. Mr. Nevitt himself returned as soon as possible after his release to his home, where he pursued the noble calling of a farmer for the rest of his days, esteemed and respected by his neighbors and all who knew him. His wife, who was Miss Ann Louisa Hutton, also of Fairfax County, survives him, with their two children, Mr. Benjamin F. Nevitt, a vestryman and registrar of Old Pohick Church, and Mrs. S. C. Smoot, of Washington, D. C., and one grandson, S. Nevitt Scott, also by one brother, Mr. T. W. Nevitt.

Mr. Nevitt was an earnest and consistent Christian man, and a devoted member and communicant of Old Pohick Church, so dear to him, and his family. As his home was some distance from the church, it was not always possible for him to attend its services in those days when the means of traveling was not as easy as it is now. Then as advancing years placed their restraint upon him, he was more and more confined to his home. But he made that his place of worship, while he ever desired to be on the day of prayer and praise in the courts of the Lord's house. For his Bible and Prayer Book were his constant companions, being the nourishment and strength and joy of his spiritual life. Thus in the quiet and ordinary round of daily duties, he fulfilled his course, serving his God in sincerity and truth, "having the testimony of a good conscience; in the communion of the Catholic Church; in the confidence of a certain faith; in the comfort of a reasonable, religious and holy hope, in favor with his God and in perfect charity with the world." All that is mortal of him now rests in the sacred ground under the shadow of the venerable church he loved so well awaiting the resurrection of the dead, and the life of the world to come.

"For if we believe that Jesus died and rose again, them also that sleep in Jesus will God bring with Him."

Entered into rest on June 9, 1918, at his home in Hampton, Va., HENRY WISE BOOKER, fifth son of Major George Booker, C. S. A., and his wife, Ann. He was born at "Sherwood," the old Booker estate near Hampton, in Elizabeth City County, March 6, 1854. He is survived by his widow, who was Miss Frances Simkins Lee, only daughter of the late Judge and Major Baker P. Lee and his wife, Mary Esther Simkins, and by two daughters, Mrs. William Lane Kelly, Jr., of Norfolk, Va., and Miss Bessie Lee Booker, of Hampton. One sister, Mrs. Nannie Booker Jones, and two brothers, Marshall Armistead Booker and Hunter Russell Booker, are all living in Hampton.

DOCTOR SAYS NUXATED IRON WILL INCREASE STRENGTH OF DELICATE PEOPLE IN TWO WEEKS' TIME

In many instances says City Physician persons have suffered for years without knowing what made them feel tired, listless and run-down when their real trouble was lack of iron in the blood—how to tell.

If you were to make an actual blood test on all people who are ill you would probably be greatly astonished at the exceedingly large number who lack iron and who are ill for no other reason than the lack of iron. The moment iron is supplied a multitude of dangerous symptoms disappear. Without iron the blood at once loses the power to change food into living tissue and therefore nothing you eat does you good; you don't get the strength out of it. Your food merely passes through your system like corn through a mill with the rollers so wide apart that the mill can't grind. As a result of this continuous blood and nerve starvation, people become generally weakened, nervous and all run down and frequently develop all sorts of conditions. One is too thin; another is burdened with unhealthy fat; some are so weak they can hardly walk; some think they have dyspepsia, kidney or liver trouble; some can't sleep at night, others are sleepy and tired all day; some fussy and irritable; some skinny and bloodless, but all lack physical power and endurance. In such cases, it is worse than foolishness to take stimulating medicines or narcotic drugs, which only whip up your fagging vital powers for the moment, maybe at the expense of your life later on. No matter what any one tells you, if you are not strong and well you owe it to yourself to make the following test: See how long you can work or how far you can walk without becoming tired. Next take two five-grain tablets of ordinary Nuxated Iron three times per day after meals for two weeks. Then test your strength again and see for yourself how much you have gained. You can talk as you please about all the wonders wrought by new remedies, but when you come down to hard facts there is nothing like good old iron to put color in your cheeks and good, sound, healthy flesh on your bones. It is also a great nerve and stomach strengthener and one of the best blood builders in the world. The only trouble was that the old forms of inorganic iron like tincture of iron, iron acetate, etc., often ruined people's teeth, upset their stomachs and were not assimilated and for these reasons they frequently did more harm than good. But with the discovery of the newer forms of organic iron all this has been overcome. Nuxated Iron, for example, is pleasant to take, does not injure the teeth and is almost immediately beneficial.

Manufacturer's Note: Nuxated Iron which is recommended above is not a secret remedy, but one which is well known to druggists everywhere. Unlike the older inorganic iron products, it is easily assimilated, does not injure the teeth, make them black, nor upset the stomach. The manufacturers guarantee successful and entirely satisfactory results to every purchaser, or they will refund the money. It is dispensed by all good druggists.

North Dakota, on Sunday, June 2, the Bishop of North Dakota ordained to the diaconate A. H. Beer, presented by Dean Kloman; and H. T. Sockett, presented by the Rev. J. N. Mackenzie. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. E. Haupt. Mr. Beer is given charge of the field of which Casselton is the center, while Mr. Sockett takes care of the missions adjoining Grafton.

In All Saints Chapel, Sewanee, Tenn., on June 11, the Rt. Rev. Thomas F. Gailor, D. D., ordained to the diaconate Messrs. G. A. Major, Paul F. Williams and George A. Manley, presented by the Rev. H. D. Phillips, chaplain of the University. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. These men will do work in the Diocese during the summer and complete their course next year.

On June 16, being the third Sunday after Trinity, in the College Church of the Holy Spirit, Gambier, Ohio, the Rt. Rev. William A. Leonard, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, ordained to the Holy Order of Deacons, Messrs. Milton G. Nicola, William R. Kinder and Francis B. Shaner, of Bexley Hall, Gambier. The Rev. Dr. D. F. Davies was the presenter, and the Rev. Dr. W. H. Dewart, of Boston, was the preacher. The Rev. Mr. Nicola will be placed at Grace Church, Ashtabula Harbor; the Rev. Mr. Kinder will be at Findlay, and the Rev. Mr. Shaner will serve in St. Martin's parish, Shaker Heights, Cleveland.

Mr. Vincent Bonnlander, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary, was recently made deacon, in the Seminary Chapel, the Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop of New Jersey, officiating. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Professor Ralph B. Pomeroy, of the Seminary.

Mr. Bonnlander is temporarily officiating in the Church of the Holy Comforter, Rahway, N. J., during the absence, in war work, of the rector, the Rev. R. W. Elliott.

On June 11, in All Saints' Chapel, Sewanee, Tenn., the Rev. Warner L. Forsyth, of Baltimore, Md., was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Gailor, who also preached the sermon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. A. A. Benedict. For the present, Mr. Forsyth will work at St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Patience is love at its best.—Ibid.

On the day we have done no good we have done much evil.

The man who lives a solitary life will die a stranger to himself.

We have no more right to think wrong than we have to do wrong.

God's work in this world is not waiting for wings as much as it is for hands and feet.

The Scotch proverb says that even the sailing of a cloud has Providence for its pilot.

We have no right to expect the windows of heaven to open until we bring all the tithes into the storehouse.

Losing my way, I groped, with fears beset;

Dim grew the day; on came the blinding night;

Hopeless, I knelt and closed my eyes to pray—

Lo, all about me streamed the Light!
—Thomas Curtis Clark.

There is a stupidity of the head; there is also a stupidity of the heart. One who is invited to the life of Christ, enjoys the fruit of the promise. "A good understanding have they that keep His commandments. The mind is strengthened and clarified. Furthermore, the whole man is quickened: he becomes a "child of the resurrection. He partakes of abounding life. Therefore an earnest Christian cannot be stupid.

It is not the fact that a man has riches which keeps him from the Kingdom of heaven, but the fact that the riches have him.—Dr. Baird.

I bargained with Life for a penny,
And Life would pay no more,
However I begged at evening
When I counted my scanty store;

For Life is a just employer.
He gives you what you ask.
But once you have set the wages,
Why, you must bear the task.

I worked for a menial's hire,
Only to learn, dismayed,
That any wage I had asked of Life,
Life would have paid.
—Jessie B. Rittenhouse.

A Christian man's life is laid in the loom of time to a pattern, which he does not know, but God sees; and his heart is the shuttle. On one side of the loom is sorrow and on the other side is joy; and the shuttle flies, back and forth carrying the thread, which is white or black as the pattern needs. And in the end, when God shall lift up the finished garment and all its changing hues shall gleam out, it will then appear that the deep and dark colors were as needful to beauty as the bright and high colors.—H. W. Beecher.

Oh! that mine eyes might closed be
To what concerns me not to see;
That deafness might possess mine ear
To what concerns me not to hear;
That truth my tongue might always tie
From ever speaking foolishly;
That no vain thing might ever rest,
Or be conceived in my breast;
That by each deed and word and thought
Glory may to my God be brought!
But what are wishes! Lord, mine eye
On Thee is fixed, to The I cry;
Wash, Lord, and purify my heart,
And make it clean in every part,
And when 'tis clean, Lord, keep it, too,
For that is more than I can do.
—Thomas Elwood, 1639.

The Significance of Conversion.

Truly there is only one way of being born again, regeneration by the power of the Spirit of God, the new heart; but there are many ways of conversion, of outwardly turning to the Lord, of taking the actual first step that shows on which side we are. Regeneration is the sole work of the Holy Spirit in the human heart and soul, and is in every case one and the same. Conversion, on the other hand, bringing into play the action also of the human will, is never absolutely the same perhaps in even two souls—as like and yet as different as are the faces of men.—John G. Paton.

THE SOLDIERS' "COMFORT KITS"

Are not complete without a box of Allen's Foot-Ease, the antiseptic powder to shake into the shoes. The Plattsburg Manual advises men in training to shake Foot-Ease in their shoes each morning. It takes the friction from the shoe, freshens the feet and gives instant relief to corns, bunions, callouses and aching, swollen, tender feet. Allen's Foot-Ease has been the standard remedy for over 25 years. Try it to-day and mail some packages to your friends in Army and Navy.

If You Value Your Health

Read Every Word of This Remarkable Story

It is told by one who has himself experienced the Regeneration in Health which he encourages you to seek by the self-same means.

THE STORY OF A GREAT DISCOVERY.

The hardships of a traveling salesman's life had wrecked my health. My family physician diagnosed my case as chronic gastritis, brought on by disease of the liver and complicated by kidney trouble. I consulted specialists in Columbia and New York who confirmed his diagnosis. Months passed, I grew worse and was finally compelled to give up my work.

By chance I heard of some wonderful recoveries which had resulted from drinking the water of a little spring in the Mineral Belt of South Carolina, a picture of which spring appears on this page. In desperation I tried it. On the second day I thought that I could notice some improvement; at the end of the first week my appetite and digestion had returned and I was much stronger; at the end of the third week I felt that I was completely restored. That was eight years ago and I still enjoy perfect health.

Knowing that it had restored my health and believing that it had saved my life, I bought the Spring.

I then determined to see whether the water would restore others as it had me. During the year I shipped ten gallons absolutely free of charge to each of one thousand sufferers from chronic diseases. Only four reported "no benefit" from the ten gallons. The other nine hundred and ninety-six reported decided benefit or complete restoration. Many claimed that the water had saved their lives.

I realized that I had discovered one of the world's greatest mineral springs, and I decided to devote the remainder of my life to it. But how could I make the world listen; how could I make them believe my story? The precious water was running to waste while thousands were suffering. I said, I will make them believe me by showing my faith in them and in the restorative power of the Spring. I will tell them that the water shall cost them nothing if it fails to benefit.

The world listened!

Some wrote for proof and I sent them the letters which I had received from their fellowmen. Others accepted my offer without question. Thousands have written me reporting relief and permanent restoration from a great variety of chronic diseases.

But some of the water still ran to waste for lack of belief. I determined that every drop should be used to relieve the suffering of humanity. To this end I requested a physician friend of mine to come to see me. At my desk I opened my mail and showed him the letters from men and women from all parts of the country who had suffered and who had found relief. I gave him my letter file and induced him to spend several days reading my past correspondence with those who were using the water. I showed him the chemical analysis and letters from physicians explaining the medicinal properties of the water. He believed, and as a result he has written this announcement for me.

WILL YOU BELIEVE?

I do not ask your implicit faith; only enough to try the water for three weeks as I did. I estimate that I drank about ten gallons, and I, therefore, offer gladly to ship you two five-gallon demijohns on my guarantee that if you find that it does not benefit you I will promptly refund the price, which is only $2.00. You must promise to drink the water in accordance with the instructions which I will send you and return the empty demijohns. I make you the sole judge as to whether the water has benefited you. I guarantee to refund your money if you are not benefited. I hope you will feel perfectly free to accept my offer.

This offer is extended to all who suffer with any chronic disease, except cancer and consumption; but I especially recommend the water for the treatment of stomach, liver, kidney and bladder diseases and for rheumatism, gout, uric acid poisoning, gallstones, diabetes, nervous headache and general debility resulting from impure or impoverished blood. These are the diseases most frequently mentioned in the thousands of letters which I have received; but my offer is open to any one who suffers from any chronic ailment. Yours sincerely,
N. F. SHIVAR, Proprietor.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.:
Dear Sir—As you are well aware, in 1909 I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered 10 gallons of your Mineral Water, which I used continuously, reordering when necessary, and in four months from date I began drinking it gained 25 lbs., was strong and perfectly well and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.
A. L. R. AVANT, M. D.
DuPont, Georgia.

Shivar Spring, Shelton, S. C.:
Gentlemen—I have suffered for years with nervous indigestion and kidney troubles. Derived more benefit from the Shivar Spring Water than from months at Hot Springs, Ark., and numerous other springs. I consider it the very best water extant.
AUGUSTUS DU PONT.
Lexington, Virginia.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—I suffered with intestinal indigestion and the Shivar Spring Water has completely restored me. I would gladly recommend it to all suffering with indigestion, kidney and liver trouble. My father had kidney trouble last fall and he thought Shivar Spring Water saved his life. Respectfully,
MRS. HARVEY DIXON.
Roper, N. C.

I am anxious to get more of the Water. It has done me more good than anything I have ever tried for rheumatism.
MRS. H. C. EDWARDS.
Warrenton, Va.

It is doing my rheumatism so much good. My limbs are beginning to feel like new ones.
MRS. JAMES R. CARTER.
Columbia, S. C.

Mr. N. F. Shivar, Shelton, S. C.: Dear Sir—Until a few weeks ago my wife was a chronic sufferer from gall stones. She was stricken critically ill and nothing but morphine seemed to relieve her pain by rendering her unconscious. Rev. A. J. Foster, pastor of Shandon Baptist Church of Columbia, S. C., advised me to take her immediately to Shivar Spring. On consulting my physician he agreed that it would be best to do so without delay. In about three days after arriving at the Spring, she was apparently relieved and had regained her appetite. She has suffered no ill effect of the trouble since. Please publish this for the benefit of sufferers.
J. P. D.

P. S.—I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

FILL OUT THIS COUPON AND MAIL IT TO-DAY.

SHIVAR SPRINGS, Box 64-P, Shelton, S. C.:

Gentlemen—I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two ($2.00) dollars for ten gallons (two 5-gal. demijohns) of Shivar Spring Water. I agree to give the water a fair trial in accordance with the instructions which you will send, and if I report "no benefit" you are to refund the price of the water in full, upon demand and upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return within 30 days.

The longer the war is waged the more deeply I am impressed with the moral and spiritual significance of the struggle in which we are engaged. During his recent visit to this country some one asked the Archbishop of York this very searching and practical question: "Your Grace, if, as you say, this is a righteous war, and God is on the side of righteousness, then why does He not give us a speedy victory?" I was much struck by the Archbishop's answer: "Because," he said, "we are not yet worthy to win the war. It must be that God in His wisdom is not yet satisfied that we are willing to dedicate all for the preservation of those great ideals which He has entrusted to us; He is not yet satisfied that He can trust the nations of the earth to carry these ideals to their fullest fruition, no matter what the cost. When He can so trust them the war will come to an end." The Archbishop is right; the supreme question before the nations of the world is not what France or England or America wants through this war, but what is God's plan and purpose? Are we, as a nation prepared to do His will? Have we yet humbled ourselves, under the mighty hand of God and sought to know His will? Not until the nation as a whole is lifted in faith to the high plane of sacrificial service and places itself in the hand of God as a willing instrument for the carrying out of His great and divine plan, will the war cease. Lord Roberts, the greatest of modern English captains, said just before his death, "England has the ammunition and she has the men, but she will never win this war, until she wins it on her knees." And it is to our knees before God that we must come; and if it be the purpose of God through the stern discipline of suffering, to bring back the nations of the world, engaged in this mighty struggle, to a recognition of His Divine Sovereignty, and to a new appreciation of spiritual values, then I do not hesitate to say that it is worth all that it costs.—Bishop Guerry, Council Address.

RECRUITING THE MINISTRY.

The present insufficiency of ministers in the Church, and the great falling off in the number of men offering for ordination which is anticipated with certainty for the next few years, is demanding a great deal of attention at this time, but not more than the subject deserves. Many of our Bishops have presented it urgently in their convention addresses. The faculties of our seminaries and our educational boards, facing the prospect of almost empty class-rooms, are earnestly considering what shall be done to meet a prospective emergency. For more than one reason the matter needs to be kept before the mind of the Church at large that our people may know the conditions by which we are confronted.

Briefly outlined, the facts are about these; quoting first from the report of a commission of the Diocese of Pennsylvania on Candidates for Holy Orders, of which Dean Bartlett, of the Philadelphia Divinity School, is Chairman.

"(1) Our communicants increased, in the quarter century ending with 1913, four times as rapidly as our clergy. (2) In the Dioceses composing the Province of Washington fewer men were ordained in 1912 by 26.6 per cent than in 1890. (3) The ratio of communicants to clergy in our Church has increased twice as fast as the average increase for seven other leading communions. (4) We have nearly twice as many parishes and mission stations as we have clergy to man them. (5) Our recruits, to the extent of nearly 50 per cent, are drawn not from families of our own Church, but from those attached to other religious bodies. (6) In spite of the obvious value of a college education to those who enter the ministry, that portion of our membership which could most easily provide its sons with this preparation is yet furnishing far less than its proper proportion of recruits. (7) There is a total lack of any system or plan for the recruiting for the ministry."

Such were the conditions before the war came in to make them worse. Just how many of our clergy have already entered war service in one capacity or another, and how many more will do so before the conflict ends, it is impossible to say. The number of absentees from this cause is increasing daily, and doubtless it will soon approximate ten per cent of the whole for the duration of the war. The first year of the war reduced the enrollment in our theological seminaries by twenty-three per cent. It is expected that this year will show a falling off of sixty-five per cent and next year eighty-four per cent. For several years thereafter, depending on the length of the war, the ordinations will only be about one-eighth of the usual number, inadequate as that was. This means that for quite a long period at best many parishes and mission churches must be left without ministers, and that is matter of deep concern. Something, doubtless, can be done for them by the employment of general missionaries, and much more by a larger use of lay readers with the assistance of neighboring rectors. But still the situation will not be met, and the great need of recruiting suitable candidates for orders to fill the ranks of the working clergy is as obvious as it is urgent.

A very small number will be found among the college men who are the usual source of supply. Only those physically unfit for military or other public duty will be left. The same may be said in regard to those within the draft age. A more promising field of supply is to be found among those who would not ordinarily be expected to meet such a demand. The Pennsylvania Commission says:

"Your Commission is persuaded, for reasons which it may not linger to state, that there is a considerable number of older men, in professional or business life, who have felt increasingly drawn to the work of the ministry, but who are hesitant because of the long years of intellectual training normally necessary, or because of the expense involved in that period of training, or simply because of the age they have reached. We are convinced that many of these men would prove competent and effective in all the usual work of the ministry. It is perhaps premature to urge the recruiting of such men as a permanent policy of the Church. But it seems eminently wise, in the present emergency, to take this step as a 'war measure'; if it proves its worth it may later win more stable recognition. We urge therefore: (1) that parish priests and others endeavor to seek out such men and bring them to the Bishop for his advice; (2) that the Bishop, the Standing Committee and the Examining Chaplains be asked, so far as the present Canons will properly permit, to arrange for a less exacting and technical test of intellectual fitness on the part of such men of established character and mature years (thirty or over); and (3) that theological seminaries be urged if possible to offer courses specially fitted for these men and, where needed, special financial assistance. We call attention to the fact that one of the dioceses of this State has, we are informed, already undertaken a 'drive' for older recruits, with such success that the numbers obtained promise almost if not quite to bring its list of postulants and candidates up to the normal pre-bellum figure."

And among the resolutions submission was the following:

"Resolved, That this Convention approves the steps already taken by the Commission in regard to recruiting, and the further projects outlined in this report; and that it requests the Bishop of the Diocese to appoint a committee of three clergymen and three laymen, to be known as the Committee on Recruiting, whose duty it shall be to carry out so much as possible of these suggestions, and in other ways, at their discretion, subject always to the approval of the Bishop, to further recruiting in the Diocese."

We doubt not that in every diocese such suggestions will be adopted by those in authority without hesitation in favor of older men fitted in other ways for a full measure of usefulness in the sacred ministry. It well behooves such men, and there are many of them, to consider well whether the great need of the Church in these times when every true man is seeking the place where he can best perform his full duty may not be a call to him to offer himself for a service so full of the richest opportunity. And not only ministers, but vestries, might well make such a suggestion to men of the proper stamp. In colonial days in Virginia this was not infrequently done, and laymen thus selected and sent across the sea for preparation and ordination always, as far as we know, fully justified this course by their worthiness and efficiency. Without doubt the experiment might often be repeated with the happiest results.

"When Christ came into Jerusalem 'all the city was moved.' And so it will be every time. When His people preach Him faithfully and reproduce Him in their lives, He comes with power and grace. It is in their hands to move the church and the community to move the Church and the community of which they are a part."

Book Notices

The Experiment of Faith. A Plea for Reality in Religion. By the Right Rev. Charles Fiske, D. D., LL. D., Bishop-Coadjutor of Central New York. Fleming H. Revell Company, New York and Chicago. Pp. 180. $1.00.

It is pleasant as well as illuminating for the reader to know how a book came to be written, especially if it was really born and not made by machinery. Bishop Fiske tells us that this book came of his being a university preacher for a week, and in feeling his way towards the message he should give he asked advice of two of the students. One said, "Preach on anything except the war," and the other suggested "some straight Christianity," of which, he said, they got mighty little. So he took these answers to a friend on one of the faculties for interpretation, who said among other things, "The war brings many spiritual problems to the front. They are the same old problems we have always had with us, only now they stand out more sharply defined. Why should we not be told something of the answer of Christian faith to such questions—with the war always in mind but never dragged in? Try it." And then he added: "And if you can show us how faith is possible, and what can be said to help the man who gropes towards it falteringly, so much the better." It was this last sentence, we take it, that gave direction to the week's preaching, and bears further fruit in this admirable little volume of fifteen papers, not sermons or even sermonettes, on that faith which is come at through genuineness and sincerity of life, or through fidelity to the faith one has. Not a new theme, but dealt with in a very incisive as well as sympathetic way and most attractive style and with the most practical spiritual purpose. An excellent book for readers who are not sure where they stand religiously, or by what steps they can reach a more satisfactory vantage ground (how many they are!). And the parson who wishes to help such people will find it suggestive and rich in illustration.

The Miracles of Jesus; As Marks on the Way of Life. By the Right Rev. Cosmo Gordon Lang, D. D., D. C. L., Archbishop of York. New American Edition. Pp. 296.

The Parables of Jesus. By the same Author. Pp. 286. E. P. Dutton and Company, publishers, New York. $1.60 each.

The recent mission of the Archbishop of York to our country made the appearance of an American edition of these useful books most timely. Not all the miracles and parables are commented upon in these companion volumes, but twelve of each, selected for some special lesson or revelation from Jesus to the human soul. This being discovered it is followed through as far as might be in its various applications. The discussions are not, strictly speaking, expository, and are by no means exhaustive, but are practical and purposeful and rich in spiritual insight. The method of treatment is most admirable and is worthy of a preacher's study. The style is simple and attractive and the matter is weighted with thought. Books with which to become familiar by frequent perusal for the sake both of the understanding and the heart.

The Holy Communion. By (the Rev.) Charles Lewis Slattery, D. D., Rector of Grace Church, New York. E. P. Dutton and Company, 681 Fifth Avenue. Pp. 57. Fifty cents.

The author in this attractive booklet avoids all controversy, and while recognizing the many views which men of devout minds may adopt in regard to the meaning of this holy Sacrament presents that which seems to him most true and helpful, "not daring to think it complete" but trusting that it may be spiritually useful. It is an explanation, we believe, which is finding wide acceptance, fixing the attention on the action of our Lord rather than on the elements in his hands, and discovering His purpose in making us partakers of the divine character of His sacrificial life given to us. Doubtless not a complete, but a very essential, conception. The little essay is thoroughly spiritual in tone, as becomes its subject, and there are few earnest communicants who will not find it illuminating and helpful.

PROGRESS TOWARD UNITY.

Mr. Editor:

Permit me to say that I enjoyed very much your editorial in the issue of June 22 on the above subject. Yet it is not clear to me how there can ever be any organic unity of the churches without some approach to definiteness in dealing with certain specific doctrines. Have not real Christians always been one in spirit? And yet this essential unity of spirit has not led to organic unity. The Church dominions are practically as definitely separated as they ever were.

As to our Episcopal Church there seems no doubt that the definite doctrine which separates us from the Roman Church on the one hand, and from other Churches on the other hand, is based on the idea contained in the words "validity of orders." In 1895 the Pope permitted a letter to be published in the London Times in support of church unity, and, if my recollection is correct, followed this letter with the appointment of a commission for the special purpose of studying the validity of orders of the Church of England. At any rate, it is a fact that in September, 1896, Leo XIII issued a bull proclaiming the absolute invalidity of English orders. Now just as Rome denies the validity of our orders, is it not true that our Church virtually denies the validity of orders of other Churches? And is it not true that this idea of the validity of orders is really the idea that separates? Is not this the definite doctrine which prevents the practical approach to unity?

The answer to this question would be an example of the kind of definiteness which I humbly believe we should face in a straightforward way.

Please permit me also to add, in all due respect, that the answer to the question seems to me a simple yes, and that all discussion of organic unity seems to me futile until the subtle idea contained in the words "validity of orders" is thrown into the same dead pile whither have gone such kindred doctrines, as, for example, the once valued doctrine of the divine right of kings. Nor does this in any way mean lack of order and orderliness and beauty of worship—any more than democracy means anarchy. Might it not simply mean that our minds have been widening until we have come to distinguish more clearly between what is real and what is not, between Christian brotherhood and ecclesiastical theory?

The theory of the importance of validity of orders depends ultimately on the doctrine of Apostolic Succession. If any one believes in this doctrine, he is, from his point of view, consistent in attaching importance to validity of orders; but if he does not believe in the fact of Apostolic Succession, then he should agree that the theory of the importance of validity of orders loses its force. I beg the privilege of submitting the following quotations from a paper which I read at the Conference of Church Clubs in Minneapolis in 1904:

"As to the historical fact of Apostolic Succession, it cannot be denied that there is honest disagreement among scholars and churchmen. We have to acknowledge once for all that it is impossible to reconstruct the first century and a half of our era. No labor of antiquarians, no projection of historical imagination, has been able to show us the actual facts of Church history in that period. We have, for example, no jot of proof that any special official administered the Lord's Supper. There seems to have been an orderly subordination to duly appointed officers, but there is no indication of any specific grace of commission in mode of appointment or transmission. The evidence is extremely scanty that to the middle of the second century there was any function assigned universally to special persons which presbyters of local churches could not perform. Indeed the preponderance of evidence and the inherent probability seem to point to the fact that the original Church order was congregational.

"It is certainly true that there is hardly any part of the doctrine of Apostolic Succession that does not present difficulties, and is not a subject of discussion among churchmen themselves. Even the famous sentence, 'Whosoever sins, etc.' is held by no less a churchman than Bishop Westcott to have been addressed to the whole body of disciples, and to have been intended as no formal commission to the apostles.

"Are we not then called upon in all seriousness to ask the question, whether a doctrine in which churchmen themselves do not agree is to be reckoned so important that it should be set up as a bar to the Church union which we invite?"

Now unless our Episcopal Church is willing to agree in waiving Apostolic Succession, what prospect is there of organic unity? If we persist in avoiding this point the discussion on our part must continue to be vague. Rather than a continuance of this vagueness, would it not be better to spend our energies in practical efforts toward avoiding rivalries and toward promoting, with all our differences, Christian co-operation?

JAMES H. DILLARD.
Charlottesville, Va., June 29, 1918.

ASSESSMENTS, BISHOPS, ETC.

Mr. Editor: Somewhere in Martin Chuzzlewit, Mr. Bumble, being told that a husband is the ruler of his wife under the law, having had some marital experience, very sagely replies, "The law is an idiot." This is true of some laws, and I feel that it might be appropriately said of our apportionment laws. We are learning that to tax the poor, the moderately well off and the rich on the same basis is not fair, for it takes from the necessary sustenance of some classes and the luxury of the other. To put a flat assessment upon congregations violates this just principle. There should be proportionate assessing. When the revenues of a congregation go over a certain amount, it should be more heavily taxed than one which falls below that mark. I do not pretend to say just where the line should be fixed, but it deserves the thoughtful attention of our leaders. A congregation of some five hundred members and over has the eclat which is due to its numbers in addition, usually, to a greater sum which it can divert to outside concerns than one smaller than that has. Business corporations whose revenues are small, are not taxed upon their revenues as the larger ones are. The settlement of our financial problems will lie along some such line as this.

Now, to exercise a preacher's license, and change my subject. Some harsh things have been said about Bishops of late, and have been said before. If we have union we shall have Bishops, because Bishops have proven worth while, and let us not make the mistake of thinking that the Laity of our Church concur in any condemnation of Bishops. I was much amused recently at a striking illustration of this fact which occurred to me, and for the moment looked dangerous for me. Bishop C. asked me to bring his printed messages to our Convention. It was a large and heavy bundle. As I was getting up the steps of my train to leave for Convention with the large bundle in my hand, a brother asked me who put that burden on me. I replied that the Bishop had given me the burden. Whereupon the conductor of the train, standing at the head of the steps, blazed out at me, "He did nothing of the kind. Bishop C. is too good for all of you, that is the trouble with you now. He ought to put more burdens on you than he does. You cannot talk about Bishop C." I explained to the conductor that I was just telling my friend why I had that package with me, and that I believed the Bishop would bear witness that no one was more willing to serve him than I was, and did it more cheerfully. The incident, however, left upon me the very pleasant impression of the esteem in which our Bishop is held, and I feel that this is the case with the great majority of them. They may make mistakes. But we may not take any superiority to ourselves, nor conclude that our people will take kindly to our criticising them. They know that we are human, too, and perhaps do less work and suffer less inconvenience for the Church than the Bishops do.

Raleigh, N. C.

THE CHURCH PENSION FUND AND THE OLD PENSIONERS.

Bishop Faber, of Montana, in Convention Address.

There is one more subject vitally concerning the General Church which I cannot forbear bringing to your attention. It is the Church Pension Fund, as by its present rules its administration affects a most deserving class of our aged clergy. Of its efficiency and its claims upon our gratitude for what it has already done and what it promises to mean for the great mass of our clergy, no one who knows can have anything but praise. And if in all dioceses the prompt payment of premiums is followed up with the methodical and painstaking fidelity with which this is done in Montana by our own Pension Committee chairman, the interests of the now active clergy will never suffer.

The main facts are so familiar to you all that I need only recall that in the great campaign for the initial reserve of Five Million Dollars for "accrued liabilities," the Church gave $8,712,000. On the basis of Five Millions ($5,064,000, to be exact) it was calculated that no clergyman retired before March 1, 1917, could be granted a pension. Those retired before that time, if in need, had already, it was assumed, been, upon recommendation of their Bishops, put upon the rolls of the General Clergy Relief Fund; and the Pension Fund took over the Relief Fund with all its existing obligations. The Relief Fund grants were $300.

"The central idea," we are told, "was to withdraw the clergy and their families from being in the class of the recipients of charity." Probably so. But it was hardly the idea of the Church to leave the oldest and neediest in this very class, and exempt from that reproach only those who retired after March 1, 1917. For those who had retired before that fateful date there was not only no possibility of emerging from that class; but, as things are now, by the fixity of that once-granted $300, no possibility of increasing the amount by appeal to the Churches' generosity to increase it, through voluntary offerings, in a time when one dollar will procure scarcely what fifty cents would a few years ago. This is "charity" surely in a very sinister sense, with all the reproach of the status and without any of its possibilities of discretion under changed conditions. The result is that the Bishop's heart is wrung with the knowledge of actual want, and he has no longer any heart of "charity" in a Board of Clergy Relief to appeal to. All he can do is to solicit, over and above whatever else he urges his people to support, gifts wherewith he may supplement the obsolete "$300 grant," now becomes a matter of "business."

The great majority of the donors of the $8,712,000 for Clergy Pensions are not actuarially educated, are not of a technical cast of mind. This great outpouring of money was prompted by their hearts; it came from that kind of Charity which St. Paul sang the praises. Face to face with the aged servant of the Church who had to retire before March 1st, 1917, who had need and could never by the rules receive one penny over his $300—there is no doubt what the mind of the giving, loving Church would say. "We supposed we were helping just such men," more than one is saying now. To reply, "We explained it all to you," is to the great Church public no reply. "Why then did you not set aside and hold for our further or different disposition all above your $5,064,000? Or, if for whatever good reason the originally named sum was found inadequate, tell us what will be adequate, and bring the balance back to the Church." Perhaps we shall need, after all, to have some General Clergy Relief again, with some discretion, some elasticity, some accessibility to appeal. For certainly we have left us, and by the very system of our scientific Pension Fund, a class requiring relief. As it is now, every Bishop is left to what he can devise in the way of personal relief. Surely, to allow aged servants of Christ to suffer because they unfortunately retired before March 1, 1917, is neither justice nor charity. I very earnestly commend this matter to you, for I feel it is one which the Dioceses should bring before next year's General Convention.

The Presiding Bishop, in Convention Address, On the Same Subject.

There is a much disturbed public opinion throughout the Church touching the equities and the law in the matter of the accrued liabilities sum in the hands of the Church Pension Fund.

(a) This is a Fund held in trust for the benefit of the aged and infirm Clergy of the general Church, and their dependents. It puts forth a scheme of premiums and policies, and has in hand in cash and pledges, as an accrued liabilities fund, a sum of $8,000,000. The Trustees say that by the law of the trust, a clergyman to be eligible to benefits from this last-named liabilities fund, must be one whose name stood upon the canonical roll of this Church as an active clergyman on March 1, 1917. Therefore, all old clergymen who were resigned clergymen or retired clergymen on that date are ineligible to the benefits of the accrued liabilities sum. Equity would seem to claim that such aged men should have not only a claim, but even a primary claim upon the benevolence of the Church. Can the claim of the official law of the trust and the claim of the strong feeling of equity be harmonized? If yes, how?

In order to help us to think clearly and to judge righteously about it as well as to guide us wisely concerning the question of what to do with our own Diocesan Fund, I recommend that a committee be appointed to take up and consider the whole subject as above outlined, and to report to the Convention what ought to be our judgment and our action in the premises.

THE CHURCH AND THE WAR.

The Rev. Percy T. Fenn, D. D.

A mass of war literature which has come from within and without the trenches has sent a spasm of pain through the whole Church. Between the lines of every book and pamphlet which comes to us from chaplain, officer, or private, we find criticism and condemnation for the Church. And we are seriously assured that if the Church is to survive the crucible through which she is now being passed, she must mend her ways, her teaching, her complex life and organization.

Priests of the English and American churches, whose duty has taken them right up to the firing lines, and Bishops and priests of renown, who have viewed the situation from afar, tell us that the Church is being "weighed in the balance," that "she has failed the world in this great world-tragedy," that her baptized members are "untaught and untrained," and that there must be a big and a sane adjustment if she is to survive the crisis.

Such assertions as these are pretty serious, and they demand the immediate consideration of our thinking men and women. If they are true, it is time for us to put our house in order. If they are false, then, in the name of everything that's good, let us know it!

As we study the history of war, and as we look at the results of the present war—so far as these results have manifested themselves—we are inclined to take a more optimistic view of the situation.

In all ages war has been a tragedy, but many of the world's greatest wars have contributed much towards the advance of civilization and the amelioration of mankind!

Look at the result of the Crusades upon art, upon literature, upon commerce, upon religion. Look at the splendid unifying power which followed from, and was largely produced by them. The democratic spirit which was fostered by the Crusades resulted, finally, in the breaking down of feudalism, and expressed itself in the forces which created the Commune and the Third Estate in France, and in the Magna Charta in England!

Knight, in his History of England, tells us that the Seven Years' War awakened the nation out of a "degraded condition," and that the principle of an exalted patriotism and a generous loyalty took the place of a venal self-seeking and a miserable abnegation of public duty.

And out of the "Thirty Years' War," the historian assures us that Europe came forth free and independent.

We need not, therefore, look very far to discover the good that has already resulted from this dreadful conflict, and the further good that will come when the war is over. Look at what has been already achieved religiously. At the outbreak of the war France had lost its grip upon religion. The churches were practically empty, and the story of the treatment accorded the religious orders makes very painful reading. But to-day we see the nation upon its knees! The people feel their need of God as never before, and they are not ashamed to acknowledge it.

Great Britain has had a similar experience. The churches may not be thronged as they are in France, but on every side there is a soul-hunger which is surprising, and a breaking down of the materialism with which the nation had been honeycombed.

Such a result was inevitable. I have met women who have lost as many as fourteen relatives in this war, and these losses have transfigured them. How could any parent surrender his children—one after another—to God and remain unchanged? His transcendent sorrow must inevitably change his attitude towards God and the life to come. And so death itself has become transfigured by this war, and the writer of an article in the Atlantic Monthly, for the month of May, calls the sombre, revolting thing that men have called death—The New Death!

The indifference and the ignorance of which the seventeen chaplains write in "The Church in the Furnace," are not at all surprising when we remember the millions of men who have gone to the front. It would be more surprising if they were not found among these men! We find the same ignorance and the same indifference among the men of every parish throughout the world.

The fault may have been in the men themselves; it may have been in those who were responsible for their religious education. But in many cases it is there, as it is here, beyond the power of the Church to remedy. And if these men do not return home with a bigger vision and with a keener sensitiveness to spiritual reality it will be because their spiritual faculties have become atrophied by disuse.

We believe, however, that our boys will come back to us with their souls glowing with God! We have seen them start from their homes to the camp, and from the camp to the battlefield, stirred with holy enthusiasm and in the spirit of the most religious of the old Crusaders. And if God should graciously spare them they will return home with a fervor and a devotion that will put us to shame!

For whatever weakness the Church may be showing in these days of turmoil and strife she is most assuredly showing at home rather than on the battlefield. This is especially true of our own country.

From every part of the Church—from Bishops, priests and consecrated laymen—there comes a call to service. Of our wealth we are giving generously to the Red Cross, to the Y. M. C. A. and to the stricken countries which have been devastated by the horrors of war. We are buying Liberty Bonds to the full extent of our ability, and our women are sewing eternally and knitting incessantly. But our churches are half empty, and our people are forgetting their spiritual duties and their spiritual food.

In our parish churches we have our service flags and our honor rolls, and on the latter we have the names of all those who have gone forth to do, to dare, and, if need be, to die for us. And we request the prayers of our people on behalf of our boys, and we offer our prayers at every service, and we plead for their safety in the sacrament of the altar.

But, to our shame be it said, many of the parents and relatives of the boys for whom we plead, seldom unite their petitions with ours in the house of God, and still more seldom do they remember them at the altar!

And yet it is on prayer that we depend for the salvation of our civilization—for the future of our homes and our nation! In an article in the Literary Digest of June 8, entitled "Our Neglect of Prayer for Victory," we read these startling words: "It is on record that when the triumphant German hosts were sweeping on Paris in 1914, and suddenly swerved and gave it up, Lord Roberts was sitting with Lord Kitchener when the telegram announcing their unlooked-for retreat was handed in. Lord Roberts, a firm believer in prayer, exclaimed, 'Only God Almighty could have done this.' 'Somebody must have been praying,' said Lord Kitchener. Neither of them mawkish or canting men, if you please. And a day or two ago I cut from a daily newspaper—not given to dilating on such matters and inserted simply as interesting items of news on two different pages—the following: 'Victory depends on prayer.' General Sir W. Robertson, in a letter regarding the intercession service at Queen's Hall on May 7, says, 'It is only when the whole empire unites in prayer as well as work that we can look forward with confidence to a successful conclusion to this tragic war and to a just and righteous peace.' The second paragraph runs thus: 'General Foch and Prayer—A Frenchman who knows General Foch tells me that he is an ardent believer in the power of prayer. 'We shall be saved by it,' he says, 'and it will not be the first time in this deadly struggle.'"

"I believe I am right in saying that Lord Jellicoe, Sir David Beatty and Sir Douglas Haig hold firmly by that belief also."

These are wonderful and weighty words, and they ought to bring us to our senses! It looks as if we shall have to wait until the big casualty lists are forced upon us, and our own dear boys are stricken and killed, before we shall get down upon our knees in penitence and prayer.

And when the war is over, and if God should spare our boys to come back to us, how shall we explain to them the apathy and the cruel indifference we have shown during their absence from us?

These boys who will have had their baptism of smoke, of fire and of blood will expect to find the altar burning, and our hearts on fire with love for God when they come back to us. If there is to be any weakening of the Church it will be when they come back to it and find us faithless! They look to us to-day to keep the home fires burning, and to keep the sacrifice alive, and many of us are failing in our duty!

It is not the wretched divisions of Christendom that is proving the impotence of Christianity nearly so much as the supineness and the indifference of Christian men and women of every name!

And wherever our prosperity is greatest this supineness is most acute. In thinking of the material side of the war we have forgotten the spiritual, aye, some of us are forgetting God!

Let us pray God to rouse us from our slumber, and let us repair to His house, and take part in the intercessions that are constantly being made. In one of our Cathedrals in which a weekly intercession is being held every Wednesday, a few weeks ago there were but three persons present, and one of these was a priest, and another the widow of the late Bishop. Is not this an index of the condition that prevails everywhere, and does it not prove the need of immediate repentance?

The Church has weathered the storms of twenty centuries, she has gone through fire and blood again and again, and no crisis is big enough to destroy her. She is coming out of the fire to-day with increased power and vigor, and she is going to catch a stupendous vision from the boys and men who will return from the world's great cataclysm. And in the strength of God and with renewed power and purity she is going out to lay hold on humanity. But she needs to-day the prayers of her children and she needs their love and service! The Church of the future will be the very same Church that we are fashioning to-day, and may God enable us to realize this, and to do our duty!

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

III. Support of Clergy, a Divine Obligation.

This well understood duty needs to be enforced in a more systematic way. If Missionary Bishops are in great need of money for their Clergy, if ministers of the Church, doing faithful and efficient work, are not properly supported financially, it is not because the Church in this land is impoverished, but because the use of money needed for that purpose is not wisely directed, because of a lack of a proper system put into force of gathering, distributing and using that money.

First, then, to name the principle, the divine obligation resting upon all our people. St. Paul states that principle clearly (Gal. 6:6): "Let him that is taught in the Word minister unto him that teacheth." In the Old Testament provision was made for the Levitical priesthood, and St. Paul says (1 Cor. 9:14): "Even so hath the Lord also ordained, that they who preach the gospel should live of the gospel."

Here is the precept, the Divine obligation, that we all know and acknowledge. But it is the practice that is faulty. This Divine obligation should be taught to all our people, and it should be enforced, by some systematic method of giving. That method should be regular, and should reach all our people.

Then, next, it may be said, these systematic gifts for support of Clergy should take preference over all other objects. Here, again, our practice is faulty. Note the teachings and practice in the New Testament. Offerings of the people for the support of the Clergy are urged, and also provision for the sick and needy. But in the early days of the Church, so far as recorded in the New Testament, no church buildings were erected, and there would seem to have been no large sums spent for the music of the church.

The inference seems plain that gifts for the support of the Clergy should take preference and precedent over gifts for these other objects. First, make provision for the needs of those who teach the Word, and then for these other good objects. Application of this principle would greatly help in present difficulties.

See how with us this precept is very poorly put into practice. Take first the weak parishes and missions. Many of them are vacant; some for a short time, others for long periods. Gifts for support of Clergy are spasmodic. When they are vacant, it is a common thing that there are no such systematic gifts at all. The people are without a shepherd, and not "taught in the Word," and they do not minister to any one that teacheth. Here is the fault to be corrected: the vacant parish or mission should be filled, and the people should give regularly and systematically for support of Clergy. Both of these things should be done, and they can be done. The two things go together.

Take the Province of the Southwest. In that Province, there are fully four thousand communicants of the Church in vacant parishes and missions, having practically no pastoral care. There are probably two or three thousand more nominally under some Clergy living at a distance, who, for various reasons, are unable to give them much pastoral care and oversight. As a rule, people so situated give little, or nothing, for church support.

Suppose that these four thousand communicants and more should give regularly and systematically an average of ten dollars each per year, and this is a low estimate. An average of fifteen dollars would be a more proper estimate. A thorough and systematic method of giving for support of the Clergy, put into practice in our weak parishes and missions in the Province of the Southwest, would probably yield not less than sixty thousand dollars a year. At a salary of $1,200 for each clergyman, fifty Clergy (and that number is very much needed to-day), could be added, all paid by people in that Province. Just two things are needed to bring about that result: (1) Systematic giving for support of Clergy, and (2) a better system of placing Clergy in their various fields of labor.

But it is not alone in weak parishes and missions that the systematic application of the Divine obligation would bring good results. In the larger and stronger parishes much more could be done.

Strong parishes have the ability to give much more than is needed for the support of their own Clergy. They have the ability to give for the support of missionaries of the Church. "Let him that is taught in the Word" minister not alone for the support of his own pastor, but for those "who preach the gospel" to others. An examination of conditions will show that there is here great room for improvement.

The Great Commission

One Day's Income Plan.

On July 6 the One Day's Income Plan totaled $62,000. This figure has been reached in a month less time than last year. The response is steady and many of the gifts have grown in size since twelve months ago.

A prominent Southern business man, in sending $100 as a special thank offering, closes his letter with, "Hoping God will humble the peoples of the Allied Nations and cause them to put their trust in God and prayer, and not entirely in our resources and might, and then give us victory and a permanent peace of nations."

Another says, "I have enjoyed 'doing my bit' on the One Day's Income Plan each year since it was begun, and it gives me pleasure to be able to double my gift this year. It is to the Church, first, that we must give in this great crisis, for it is to the Head of our Church that we are looking for the strength to come through the struggle victorious." This in similar strain: "I am very glad to add my mite to the One Day's Income Plan and esteem it a privilege to do so. Our missionaries are as truly fighting as our boys in France, and we at home who are too old or too weak to do the fighting must supply the ammunition to those who can."

The District of North Dakota has brought joy to the Church Missions House by requesting that its apportionment be increased twenty-five per cent for the current year. And North Dakota is a jurisdiction where every congregation can be counted upon to meet or exceed its minimum quota. This is the third jurisdiction which has voluntarily increased its apportionment goal this year—all three of them Missionary Districts.

Bishop Graves, of Shanghai, writes: "Confirmations are more numerous this year than ever. I have had several classes of twenty, amongst them Nanking, which is a very new station. I was at the last place on Sunday and ordained the Rev. K. T. Chung to the Priesthood. Mr. Dyer and Mr. Gill were the foreign clergy present, and the Chinese clergy were: The Rev. K. T. Chung, the Rev. S. N. Tsu, the Rev. S. K. Sung and the Rev. Lindel Tsen. Mr. Tsen preached the sermon. Altogether the day was a happy one, I think, for our clergy and for the congregation at Nanking.

"At Yanchow, on the fourth of May, they celebrated the tenth anniversary of the founding of the Mission. The proceedings lasted all the afternoon and evening, and were ably organized. Several hundred people were present and enjoyed themselves greatly. Mahan School is doing better than ever and is a great credit to the Church."

From the Missions House.

A telegram has just reached us from Archdeacon Stuck asking for an assistant teacher in the school at Fort Yukon, Alaska. She would have charge of the primary work and should be a capable and trained kindergartner. Miss Dalziel, formerly of St. Michael's Parish, New York, is head teacher and will continue to have charge of the higher grades.

Fort Yukon also needs a trained woman, preferably a deaconess, to become matron of St. Stephen's Hospital.

I will take pleasure in supplying particulars concerning either of these posts.

The Right Rev. Charles J. Ferguson-Davie, D. D., Bishop of Singapore, writes me:

"A great many Americans are coming into this Diocese, some of whom have brought letters of introduction. Would you in some way let it be known that if our Churchmen are coming we shall be very glad if a note giving their exact address could be sent to introduce them. I will forward to the Chaplain concerned the name of any such person."

Bishop McKim has completed twenty-five years as Missionary Bishop of Tokyo, Japan. He was consecrated on June 14, 1893, in St. Thomas' Church, New York, as was also Bishop Graves, of Shanghai.

In 1893 there were four churches and two missions in the city of Tokyo. There are at present ten churches and three missions.

In 1893 there were seven places outside of Tokyo where services were held regularly; there are now fifty-six.

In 1893 St. Paul's School for Boys had fifty students; since then it has been expanded into the nucleus of a university, and has, in its various departments, nearly eight hundred students.

St. Margaret's School for Girls in 1893 had forty-nine pupils; its present number is two hundred and seventy-five.

Church Intelligence

The Churches on "A League of Nations."

In a letter to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Secretary of the National Committee on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War expresses the opinion that the ministers of the United States overwhelmingly favor the organization of a League of Nations. Dr. Atkinson bases his belief on replies to a letter addressed by the National Committee to church leaders throughout the country. Out of 400 answers representing virtually all denominations and states, only six were unfavorable to the League of Nations proposition. Four of these opposed any discussion of the problem during the war. The other two are Quakers, who wrote that they could not conscientiously favor any league that would sanction the use of armed force.

The National Committee undertook this canvass as the result of an appeal for support of a League of Nations issued by the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Bishops of Winchester, Oxford, Southwark and Peterborough, the Moderator of the Established Church of Scotland and other prominent British clergymen and addressed to the Christian nations of the world.

"There is no doubt," says Dr. Atkinson in his letter, "that on this fundamental question of both war and peace the churches of America and Great Britain are in close accord."

The Summer Training School for Workers will be held at Sewanee, Tenn., August 5th to 13th inclusive, opening Tuesday, the 6th, at 6 P. M. with an opening service in the chapel, to be followed at 8 P. M. by an address on the "Call to Preparation" by Bishop Mikell. Each morning there will be a celebration of the Holy Communion at 7 o'clock, and four periods of instruction on Missions, Social Service, Christian Education, and Church and Country Life, conducted respectively by Mrs. Biller and Miss M. P. Ford, the Rev. G. Croft Williams, the Rev. Gardiner L. Tucker and the Rev. J. N. Atkins. The afternoons will be given to conferences, with evening service and short addresses, and special addresses will be delivered in the evenings by selected speakers.

The registration fee is $2.50. Board at the Sewanee Inn, $10.00 a week.

For further information apply to Rev. Mercer P. Logan, D. D., address until July 31st, Charleston, S. C., after that date Sewanee, Tenn.

The object of the Summer Training School is to train leaders for the work of Church in the Departments of Education Social Service and Missions. The keynote of this year's program will be "Leadership."

Unfounded . Criticism . Criticised: Prominent ministers who are making the rounds of the cantonments, preaching to enlisted men, have joined in a protest against public criticism, which they say is wholly misinformed and yet uttered on the quiet by what is claimed to be authority, of administration of Army and Navy affairs. Their protest is now being sounded by the Rev. Dr. James E. Freeman, rector of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, Minneapolis. The Rev. Dr. Freeman has himself made the round of most of the cantonments. Agreeing with him, he says, are all of the preachers of all bodies, who have had opportunity to observe. He believes the criticisms are hurting the efficiency of the service, and helping nobody except the Germans.

Points which the Minneapolis rector makes, and which he says voice the judgment of other cantonment preachers, are that these cantonments, the spirit shown in them, and the administration of them, prove splendid efficiency at Washington; that ministers are in position to judge; and that the cantonments are the place to apply the test. However, the Minneapolis rector says he claims no special ability; that anybody can see for himself. Their praise of Washington extends from President Wilson to the humblest official, and is that the Government's administration is applied Christianity of the highest order. They ask that private judgment restrain itself in times like these. Especially praiseworthy, according to this leader from the North West, is the spirit of unity, which is both in religious bodies and among officers and men.

Grace Church, Whittle Parish, The Plains, Va.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Consecration of the New Grace Church, The Plains, Va.

The most important event of recent years in the country parishes of Virginia was the consecration of the beautiful and ideally appointed church of massive stone construction, Grace Church, The Plains, Va., on Friday morning, June 28, at eleven o'clock.

This goodly parish church of rural Virginia was commenced only two years ago under the splendid leadership of its present rector, the Rev. Edmund Lee Woodward, M. A., M. D., supported by a loyal vestry and a people "with a mind for the work." It is a witness in stone of what great things God hath wrought where devoted hearts are united in His service. Here is a typical rural parish, which in four years has given a third of its former bounds to strengthen a weaker neighboring parish, doubled its own communicant membership, quadrupled its gifts for current support and missions, provided the unprecedented sum of nearly fifty thousand dollars for rebuilding the rectory and church and for a new parish house—an entire remaking of its equipment, made community life center about the church to a gratifying degree, and led its community and neighboring communities in patriotic endeavors which have received nation-wide commendation.

No wonder the hearts of many were full of thanksgiving to Almighty God for His good hand upon them in giving the opportunity and the ability to accomplish so great a work.

In spite of busy harvest time, every seat was occupied and extra chairs filled the side aisles. The beloved Bishop of Virginia, the Rt. Rev. Robert A. Gibson, D. D., was consecrator; Bishop Brown being also present with the Rev. Berryman Green, D. D., Dean of the Theological Seminary at Alexandria, preacher of the day, and twelve other Clergy, representing various parts of the Diocese. The Rev. Dr. John McGill, former rector of Grace Church, though too unwell to be present, sent a message of greeting, and similar messages were received from over fifty of the Clergy and representative Laity of Virginia and neighboring Dioceses. The Clergy were vested and took part in the service with the Bishops, as indicated below.

The Bishops led the procession of Clergy to the front door of the church, where Bishop Gibson symbolically knocked three times (in the Name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost). The Junior Warden, Mr. Edward G. Turner, with the vestry, opened the door and gave welcome to the congregation awaiting within. The regular service of consecration followed.

The instrument of donation was read by Mr. A. Walton Fleming, Registrar of the vestry, and presented by James R. Foster, Senior Warden. The sentence of consecration was read by the rector, Dr. Woodward.

Morning Prayer was read by the Rev. William Meade, great-grandson of Bishop Meade, who consecrated the former Grace Church in 1855, the Rev. E. B. Burwell, rector of Trinity Church, Upperville; the Rev. W. G. Pendleton, rector of St. James Church, Warrenton, and Dean of Piedmont Convocation; the Rev. Conrad H. Goodwin, rector of St. James Church, Leesburg, and the venerable and beloved rector emeritus, Rev. J. J. Norwood.

The Ante-Communion was read by Bishop Brown, Archdeacon Neve, of the Blue Ridge, reading the Epistle, and the Rev. Professor S. A. Wallis, D. D., of the Seminary at Alexandria, the Nicene Creed.

After Hymn 205, "Thy temple is not made with hands," Dean Green preached from the second verse of the Sixty-third Psalm, "So have I looked upon Thee in the sanctuary to see Thy power and Thy glory," a sermon of splendid uplift and inspiration, a clarion recall of our generation to the public worship of God. The offertory anthem, "Be thou faithful unto death," was sung by Mr. Lawrence R. Lee, of Leesburg. Bishop Gibson was celebrant at the Holy Communion assisted by Bishop Brown, the Rev. R. A. Goodwin, A. S. Gibson, Dr. Woodward, Dr. Wallis and Archdeacon Neve.

The musical portion of the service was rendered by a full vested choir, in which the choirs of St. James Church, Warrenton, St. James Church, Leesburg, and St. Paul's Church, Haymarket, united. Mrs. Charlotte Nelson Holt, organist of the Warrenton choir, presiding at the organ.

Members and friends from the churches at Warrenton, Manassas, Haymarket, Marshall, Markham, Hume, Millwood, Upperville, Leesburg, Middleburg, Alexandria and Richmond, were present, as were representatives of other denominations throughout the countryside.

Testimony to the breadth of relationship of the rural church was shown also by the congratulatory letters from scores of friends unable to be present in person. Extracts from a few of these were read by the rector. Among others from Mr. Elbridge T. Gerry, the distinguished and venerable New York Churchman, who, with his son, Mr. R. L. Gerry, has been the largest donor to the New Church Building Fund, from Mrs. E. H. Harriman, of New York; from the Rev. Hunter Yen, formerly associated with Dr. Woodward at the Cathedral of Our Saviour, Anking; from Bishop Gravatt, of West Virginia, and Bishop Tucker, of Southern Virginia.

Bishop Harding, of Washington, wrote: "My experience has made me realize how important in the life of the Church is the rural parish. . . . I wish to congratulate you very heartily upon the fine equipment and the attainment of the ideal, which should make every such rural parish a center of life in the whole community. I wish you a very successful and glorious festival, and that what you have done in Virginia may inspire the rural workers everywhere to try to follow in your footsteps."

From Bishop Lloyd, President of the Board of Missions and former Bishop-Coadjutor of Virginia: "If the Church could be not only the center of the spiritual life of the community, but at the same time the center of the influence and instruction concerning everything that makes for the community's best development, everybody would recognize the essential relation that Christianity and civilization have to one another. I believe your work will demonstrate this, and I hope that every community in Virginia will follow your example. All cannot have to begin with the delightful plant that you have provided, but all can have a plant sufficient to put the work in operation, and once the importance of it is seen, the community will do the rest. I wish I could be there to shake your hand and to bid you and your people God-speed."

From the venerable Presiding Bishop of the Church, Bishop Daniel S. Tuttle, of Missouri: "A wonderful unification of the English-speaking races is taking place. The war urges it on. The English Church with its English Bible and its English Book of Common Prayer has helped to prepare the way. America is glad and proud to bear her part. Virginia is glad and proud to preserve and maintain her historic Church lineage and polity. Virginia rural life is glad and proud to show equally with urban life its claim to steadfast Church loyalty and love."

Immediately following the conclusion of the service a bountiful luncheon was served to the Clergy and all visitors by the ladies of the church in the spacious parish hall, and the day found its fitting end in a great patriotic rally of the whole neighborhood at the parish hall, at which the sum of nine thousand dollars was added to the W. S. S. community quota. From this parish hall as a center several hundred thousand dollars have been subscribed to the war loans of the government, and many thousand dollars given to the Red Cross and other war philanthropic agencies.

The series of services associated with the consecration on Friday was extended over to the following Sunday, June 30, with infant and adult baptisms, the confirmation by Bishop Gibson of a class of thirteen candidates, and a missionary service at night, with a splendid address by the Rev. R. A. Goodwin. The liberal offering of this service was designated for the Building Fund of the new church at Kuling, Mid-China, just being begun: "Freely ye have received, freely give."

The noble parish church, seating normally about three hundred, with its parish hall with four hundred capacity, was designed by Mr. Irwin Fleming, the well known architect of Washington, D. C., who has spared no pains to make it a peculiarly fine example of early English rural Gothic architecture of the thirteenth century, the age of the Magna Charta of the English liberties in Church and State.

The holy table of white Indiana limestone is of chaste dignity. Its massive proportions and pillared columns suggest the famous painting, "The Vigil." It is surmounted by an exquisitely carved reredos of old English fumed oak, in harmony with the completely appointed furnishings of quartered oak, and with the wainscot and open woodwork ceiling. The sanctuary is paved with Gothic tiles of blended tints, with quaint insets of Christian symbolism, designed after the sanctuary pavement of a fourteenth century church in Wiltshire, England.

A feature perhaps unique in the Diocese, is the placing of a baptistry in the church vestibule connecting the transept with the parish house annex. It is a witness to immersion as a method of baptism of immemorial honor in the Church, as indicated in the rubrics of the baptismal service in the Prayer Book. It is proposed to supplement the baptismal pool with a handsome font, as of equal honor and age-long use, at no distant date.

A score or more memorials have been associated with the various parts of the church building or furnishings, linking up the Church at rest with the Church militant. The most notable perhaps of these is the series of pews to the ten Bishops and Bishops-Coadjutor of Virginia and to the ten rectors. Those to the Bishops have been given through representative sister churches, the Seminary and Piedmont Convocation of Virginia.

The windows are of cathedral glass, with one of stained glass, the figure of St. Luke, the beloved physician, a memorial to Dr. Robert F. Fleming.

The massive walls and tower, built of the one thousand four-horse loads of local stone hauled from the neighboring farms as a free will offering of the farmer owners, will stand for centuries to come. The variegated tints of green and brown in the rustic, unhewn stone give a rare charm to enhance the generally harmonious effect. The tower, Norman in its strength and proportions, is surmounted by a truncated spire, from which rises a beautiful Celtic cross of copper. The bell of the old church is at present hung in the tower.

Crowning the front wall of the tower are three representative stones from the foundations of the former church, witnessing to future generations their precious heritage from the past.

The cornerstone of the new church itself, bears the date—1855—of the building of the former church, the name Grace, and the date—1917—of the laying of the present cornerstone. Above it will be a tablet recording the fact that it was laid with the silver trowel used in 1793 to lay the cornerstone of the national capitol by George Washington, the Father of his country and the faithful son of a rural Virginia parish, in which he served as vestryman.

The model parish hall built as an annex to the church is of the same material and in harmonious keeping. In addition to the commodious and perfectly appointed hall itself, adaptable either as a model Sunday-school building or for a general community center, there is the vestry room, choir rooms for men and women, kitchen, furnace room, three lavatories and a library for three thousand volumes, already half filled. A motion picture apparatus is in frequent use.

One wing of the parish hall, when curtained off, forms a charming little chapel for Lenten and other special services, in which the chancel has been furnished with the chancel furnishings of the former church, thus permanently preserved with their hallowed associations. The whole arrangement of the parish hall and parish rooms exhibits an admirable completeness and adaptation to the various needs which such an equipment should meet to render efficient the great mission of the Church in the rural community.

The church stands in the center of a well shaded churchyard of more than an acre in extent in the very center of the little village. The shrubbery of the churchyard is being developed under the hands of an expert landscape gardener. Along the main street front is a stone wall, to be covered later, as will portions of the church, with the small-leaved, lace-like ivy from Kenilworth Castle. Growing box hedges along the sides of the churchyard will in years to come give a frame work in perfect keeping to the whole picture.

Though the Church has been planted in Virginia since 1607, this is so far as is known, the first time that a distinctively rural parish has attained anything like such a completeness of equipment for efficient work in all its varied relationships, of worship, teaching, social life and general community helpfulness. May we not take courage to believe that such possibilities are latent in every rural parish in the Diocese, to those who have the vision to see them and the resourceful leadership to claim them as the Promised Land of the rural Church.

Little Fork Church (Colonial), Oak Shade, in St. Mark's Parish, Culpeper County, was opened on the Fifth Sunday after Trinity for the annual services. These were held at 11-A. M. and 3 P. M., the Rev. Henry Townsend Scudder, D. D., of New York, preaching morning and afternoon. Large congregations well filled the old church, for it holds a big place in the hearts of the community, and this annual meeting for worship and social cheer is always well attended. The church has been put in good repair, and monthly services are held here all summer, and in St. Mark's Chapel, Rixeyville, a few miles distant, the rest of the year, by the rector of St. Mark's Parish, the Rev. K. J. Hammond, D. D.

The members of Kingston Parish, Mathews County, with the liberal aid of friends, have secured for the use of their much beloved rector, the Rev. B. N. de Foe Wagner, a beautiful Chevrolet touring car, which is so necessary to the efficient working of the parish.

The Rev. J. J. Clopton, of Cape Giardeau, Mo., will officiate at St. Thomas' Church, Orange, during the month of August.

EASTON.

Rt. Rev. Wm. F. Adams, D. D., Bishop

The Peninsula Summer School.

The Peninsula Summer School met in the Casino of the Hotel Plimhimmon, Ocean City, Maryland (Diocese of Easton), on June 24 to 27, inclusive. The school was both entertaining and instructive. The faculty and subjects were:

"Child Study," by Miss Helen I. Jennings, Pottsville, Pa.

The Bible, "The Prayer of Our Lord," by the Rev. George C. Foley, D. D., professor Philadelphia Divinity School.

"The Church's Mission in the Sunday-school," by Mrs. John Loman, General Board of Religious Education.

"Methods in the Sunday-school," by the Rev. Kensey J. Hammond, D. D., Culpeper, Va.

"Story Telling," by Mrs. M. K. Hawks, of St. James Parish, Philadelphia, Pa.

Sectional conferences for the Clergy and others were attended throughout.

Disagreeable weather at the beginning of the sessions no doubt kept some from being present. But the fact that a State Normal School for Teachers was also in session in Ocean City, Md., gave opportunity for many to attend the institute. There were twenty-two enrollments.

The Rev. Dr. Hammond, of the faculty, asked the privilege of saying a closing word, and he very aptly summed up the scope of the school in the following manner. He characterized Miss Jennings' lectures on "Child Study" as Our Field. The lectures by Mrs. Loman, as Our Mission. His own lectures on "Methods in the Sunday-school," he spoke of as Our Machinery. The lectures by Mrs. M. K. Hawks, on "Story Telling," as Our Interest, and those of Dr. Foley, on "The Prayers of Our Lord," as Our Inspiration, and the motto of all that was done in our Lord's words, "Feed my lambs." After the singing of the hymn, "Blest Be the Tie That Binds," and the benediction the school adjourned.

A definite organization was effected as follows: The Rev. Thomas Getz Hill, rector of St. Peter's Church, Smyrna, Delaware, chairman (Diocese of Delaware); the Rev. Percy Lowry Donaghy, rector St. Anne's Church, Middletown, Delaware, Secretary (Diocese of Delaware); the Hon. D. G. Roe, of Sudlersville, Maryland, Treasurer (Diocese of Easton). And the following as a committee: Mr. Robert J. Showell, Ocean City, Maryland; the Rev. J. D. Cummins, Centreville, Maryland; the Rev. Herbert D. Cone, Salisbury, Maryland; Mrs. W. H. Beacom, 1312 West Tenth Street, Wilmington, Delaware; Mr. Frederick Bringham, Wilmington. And four representatives are requested to be appointed from the Diocese of Southern Virginia.

NEWARK.

Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. R. Stearly, D. D., Coadjutor.

Ordination: On Sunday, June 30, in Christ Chapel at Wortendyke, Bishop Stearly ordained Mr. Hugh W. Dickinson to the diaconate. The Bishop preached and the Rev. Charles E. Berghaus presented the candidate. Mr. Dickinson was a student at Wyckliffe College, Toronto, and now has charge of our mission churches at Wortendyke and Glen Rock.

Several of the Clergy have offered themselves for war service and are waiting instructions. Twenty-six of the Clergy of the Diocese are now or have been in the government service directly or in Y. M. C. A., Red Cross or military camp work.

The Rev. William H. Watts, of Hale-dome, has gone abroad as a Y. M. C. A. Secretary.

Rev. Henry B. Todd has resigned Trinity Church, Paterson, to take the rectorship of St. Paul's, Hoboken, in September.

Rev. Chapman S. Lewis, of South Amboy, becomes rector of St. Stephen's, Jersey City, in September.

Rev. Allan Green, of Peabody, Mass., becomes rector of St. John's, West Hoboken, in the autumn.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

The Rev. Frank A. Ridout, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Onancock, has arrived safely in France according to advices received by his friends in that place. Mr. Ridout was granted a leave of absence with salary by his vestry in order that he might take up Y. M. C. A. work with the army. He had previously been active in community war work. The Sunday-school of this church is 100 per cent. Red Cross and is supporting a French child for a year.

Mr. A. A. Onthank, of Grace Memorial Church, Lynchburg, left June 30th for Overseas War Work in Y. M. C. A.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Aid for Returning Soldiers: Episcopal, Presbyterian, Baptist, Methodist and Reformed Church women, identified with Home Mission work, have taken steps to help the New York Red Cross to care for sick soldiers, sailors and airmen. Their special work, in such help, is hospitality to soldier mothers. It is stated to be the purpose of the government to hold in New York all men brought back seriously wounded, no matter from what State they come, and not send them forward upon their arrival on hospital ships. The reason is to give them the best treatment the world offers. To that end a great base hospital is preparing in the heart of Manhattan. It is not far from either river, East or Hudson. From it are to be distributed to other hospitals all sick men according to their cases. Greater hospitals than America ever dreamed of erecting are already completed.

The services sought to be rendered by these women identified with the missionary societies is to assist parents to locate their sick sons, to see that mothers of such sons are comfortably cared for in boarding places they can afford and that New York homes are opened to them, and to furnish volunteer men to perform such services for the sick and dying as only men can render. Already the work has started, and the women are doing their part to enlarge it. It is found that many parents are unable to go to New York, owing to distance or poverty, or both, and women are provided to visit sick men in places of mothers, and render such personal service as they may be able to do. New York men and women are putting system into this service.

The workers are coming chiefly from the churches and many business houses, country clubs, lodges and athletic associations are helping a fund for expenses.

Improvements at the Cathedral: To any one who has watched the growth of the Cathedral foundation the material exhibit which it makes this summer, as compared with past years, is most gratifying. For a long time unkept grounds, buildings in the making, plans not yet carried through—such has been the aspect. Observers have been compelled to say to themselves and to others that by and by a Cathedral foundation worthy the name and seeming to be worth the immense expense, will come into being.

For the first time, the foundation presents this summer such established appearance. The grounds at the southeast corner, in front of the deanery; the open air pulpit and the walks around the Synod Hall; and the walks leading to the choir school—all these are kept in a manner faintly suggesting the Cathedral close of England. The buildings, some of them for the first time having the exterior stone that is permanently to appear, exhibit such solidity, such boldness, and such wealth of material, as to indicate adequate return for large sums of money expended. The great floor of the nave, complete to water table, and large enough to carry tents needed for a regiment, gives for the first time some conception of the vast size of the Cathedral, even before transepts are built.

One cannot help wondering how any human voice can make itself heard from sanctuary and pulpit to the distant western end of the nave, and answers his question by reflecting that there is much to a Cathedral besides hearing what preachers say. The vast expanse north of the Cathedral, fronting St. Luke's Hospital, is to be filled in in part by Clergy houses, but any one who knows that hospitals are not ideal as close neighbors, especially to nervous people, will be disconcerted a little by reflecting that on the south side as well as the north there is a hospital, the Woman's. On the whole, the Cathedral of St. John the Divine most strikingly shows, for the first time this summer, something of what it is to be in buildings and grounds. And the showing amply vindicates the judgment of builders, and justifies the expenditure of the vast sums of money.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. W. A. Guerry, D. D., Bishop.

The ninth annual council of the colored churchmen of the Diocese met in St. Luke's Church, Columbia, on June 26-27 with Bishop Guerry presiding. After the Holy Communion, celebrated by the Bishop, he delivered his annual address.

The Rev. H. B. Delany, Suffragan Bishop elect of North Carolina, was present and was warmly greeted by the Council. He was presented at the first session and made a short address. After his consecration Dr. Delany will give a stated portion of his time to the diocese of South Carolina under the direction of the Diocesan.

Archdeacon E. L. Baskerville read an encouraging report of the condition of the colored work, showing marked progress in many lines. In spite of shortness of funds and hard times all the workers had been kept in the field and were showing a spirit of real self-sacrifice. The colored Churchmen were showing a growing spirit of self-help and every mission was contributing according to its means for the support of the Church's work. He made a plea for additional day schools, emphasized by the illiteracy shown to exist among the drafted colored men whose usefulness was thereby impaired. Education and evangelization must go hand in hand. The report called attention to the loyalty of the negro and pointed out various ways in which he was expected to be of service to the country.

A resolution requiring each colored communicant to pay twenty-five cents annually towards the support of the acting suffragan Bishop when consecrated was adopted.

The Hon. Richard I. Manning, Governor of the State, made an address on the second day, stressing the duty of the colored people in the present crisis and urging the maintenance of high moral standards. Other addresses were delivered and the discussions of the Council were helpful and inspiring. The Woman's Auxiliary met at the same time.

Bishop W. A. Guerry will shortly leave for France as a special preacher to the American forces, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

On Independence Day a solemn and significant patriotic service was held in historic Christ Church, Savannah, which was attended by a crowded congregation.

The Confederate veterans occupied seats at the front of the church on the left and city and county officials and representatives of patriotic organizations occupied seats on the right. Daughters of the American Revolution attended the service in a body, and representatives of many patriotic and business organizations which are factors in the life of the city were present.

Bishop Reese, Bishop Osborne, of Springfield, the Rev. John D. Wing, rector of Christ Church; the Rev. W. T. Dakin, rector of St. John's, and the Rev. S. B. McGlohon, rector of St. Paul's, conducted the service.

Special lessons and prayers and patriotic hymns served to deepen the impression of the occasion.

The sermon was preached by the Right Rev. Frederick F. Reese, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, from the text, "The Lord God Omnipotent reigneth." He reminded his hearers that the hour was one for prayer, with belief in a God who concerns Himself in human affairs and whose divine purpose is to be sought even in a day so dark as the present one and among events so terrible as those that mark it.

America, he said, should look back upon the first Independence Day in no spirit of pride or boastfulness, but with grateful hearts for a freedom that was possible of achievement only because the ideals of freedom were everywhere leavening the hearts of men and because here, in a new, fresh, untried country were youth and strength which could bring these ideals to fulfillment. Long before the American Revolution, he recalled, England's own belief in democracy had been declared and the first fruits of this declaration were realized in the American colony after a war that we may now look upon as a civil war between brothers, rather than as a war against a foreign enemy. That America, blest with such freedom, has failed to appreciate her obligation to the rest of the world and has believed it possible to live in selfish isolation, enjoying the benefits of democracy and recognizing no debt to nations less fortunate, has been, he held, a mistake too long made and a misinterpretation of the principle enunciated by Washington when he advised against entangling alliances.

If America has now awakened from this dream and is making a restatement of the doctrines of liberty and justice on which the nation was founded by allying herself with those other nations of the earth who are fighting to make them prevail it is an earnest, he said, of a future in which America will no longer live to herself alone, but in which she will be one of the brotherhood of all free nations. Towards such a future, he predicted, a democracy founded on the principles which brought America to birth, must come, in a future in which her people will be no longer Americans, merely, but citizens of the world in the brotherhood of free men.

LEXINGTON.

Rt. Rev. L. M. Burton, D. D., Bishop.

Margaret College Commencement: The recent commencement exercises of Margaret College, Versailles, Kentucky, the Rev. George H. Harris, Dean, and the Rev. J. M. Maxon, President covered a period of four days. There was held the annual May Fete, with the presentation of two plays, "The Little Shepherdess" and "A Pot of Broth," given under the direction of Mrs. Sallie Bullock Cave, of the Lexington College of Music. At the baccalaureate service in St. John's church the Rev. J. M. Maxon, former rector of the Church and President of the college, delivered a strong sermon to the graduating class, in which he held out before them the one task, plain and well defined, to "Win the War," characterizing it as especially a "woman's war." The class day exercises and the alumni reunion followed, the commencement exercises being held on the closing day, with address by the Rt. Rev. Charles E. Woodcock, D. D., Bishop of Kentucky. Bishop Woodcock spoke on "The Challenge of Life," pointing out in his usual uplifting and inspiring manner the "challenge of country" and "the challenge of Christianity." Bishop Burton presented the certificates to the graduates, Dean Harris awarding the gold cross of honor to Miss Juliet Lee Risque, of Midway, the collegiate graduate. The other graduates were: College Entrance, Misses Margaret MacLeod, Margaret Edwards and Blanche Hunter, of Versailles; Alice Riddell, Irvine; Dorothy Hinton, St. Louis; Mary K. Weber, Paris; Anna L. Langendorff, Bellevue, Ky. High School: Misses Ann Riddell, Irvine; Helen Bowen, Winchester; Lois Foster, Harrodsburg; Martha Glogauer, Cincinnati; Edith Hunter, Butte, Mont.; Caroline Webb, Dallas, Texas; Grace Pilcher, Louisville.

The school closed its most successful year, during which the patriotic spirit was not lacking. The school girls had given, chiefly out of their spending money, $500 to the Red Cross and other war activities; a $50 Liberty Bond had been given to the Endowment Fund, and $500 worth of Thrift Stamps sold in the school, every pupil and teacher being represented therein.

Almost all of the present faculty will return next year.

Three Ordinations in Four Days: The Rt. Rev. Lewis Burton, D. D.,

Bishop of Lexington, has recently officiated at three ordination services, in all of which the Rev. F. B. Wentworth, Archdeacon of the Diocese and Secretary of the Standing Committee, was the presenter.

On St. Peter's Day, Saturday, June 29th, 10:30 A. M., at St. Andrew's Church (colored), Lexington, Mr. Egerton E. Hall was ordained Deacon. Archdeacon Wentworth was the preacher. Mr. Hall will have charge of St. Andrew's Mission.

Sunday, June 30th, at the Church of the Nativity, Mayesville, 10:45 A. M., Mr. W. B. Dern, graduate of the Virginia Seminary, was ordained to the Diaconate. The Rev. George H. Harris, Dean of Margaret College, Versailles, was the preacher. Mr. Dern will be General Missionary of the Diocese.

At Christ church Cathedral, Lexington, on Tuesday, July 2nd, the Rev. Thomas L. Settle Deacon in charge of St. Mary's Church, Middlesboro and of the Mission at Pineville, was ordained to the Priesthood. The preacher was the Rev. J. J. Gravatt, Jr., rector of the Church of the Ascension, Frankfort.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

The Clerical Union held its last meeting for the season of 1917-18 on Monday, June 24, at the Church of the Incarnation, Knoxville, the opening service being a celebration of the Holy Communion by the Rev. L. F. Cole, rector. Luncheon was served by the ladies of the congregation, and was followed by the reading of a paper by the Rev. Dr. H. A. Flint, of Crafton, introducing a discussion on social and economic conditions after the war, which elicited much enthusiasm. There was a good attendance, and the season just closed is considered a very helpful and successful one.

Outdoor Services: During the month of June several of the parishes having been holding the Sunday evening service outdoors, the choirs singing familiar and patriotic hymns, and the addresses being largely of a patriotic character, sometimes by a clergyman, other times by a layman or laywoman. In the east end section of the city, Calvary parish, our largest congregation, has united with neighboring Christian congregations in a community service on Sunday evenings, with the choirs of all the churches, and a sermon by some of the pastors. Large congregations have gathered, as many at times as 1,500. The services have been held on a large vacant lot near Calvary Church. In connection with this service there has been instituted what has been designated as "The Call of the Bells." Every night at eight o'clock the chimes of Calvary Church play America, and all who are within sound of the bells, and others who will, are asked to unite in two short prayers for the nation, the soldiers and sailors, and victory.

A community service is to be held during the evenings of July and August in Carnegie Music Hall, for the Oakland District of the city, in which several of our churches and clergymen have been invited to take a share.

Ordination: On Sunday, June 30th, at St. Mark's Church, Pittsburg, Bishop Whitehead advanced to the priesthood the Rev. David Vincent Gray, in charge of St. Mark's parish and the Mission of Transfiguration, Clairton. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. (Continued on page 21.)

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

CATCHING UP WITH THE BIBLE.

We live in truly tremendous times. We see or hear of something new and strange almost every day. "Change" is the watchword of the hour.

But after all are these things to which we are unaccustomed really new, or are they only unfamiliar?

If we delve in the Bible a little we shall be astonished to find how many of our new things are God's old things.

Indeed, nothing is more surprising to some people than, being shown to what an extent the Bible enters into our every day life.

For instance, we go to buy a quarter's worth of sugar (one can't get more than a quarter's worth at one time), and we use the dove out of Noah's ark that is stamped upon that coin, to make our purchase.

Ever since the dove returned to Noah with the olive leaf in her mouth, as we are told in the eleventh verse of the eighth chapter of Genesis, have these two things been emblems of peace.

Again we hear a great many new phrases nowadays. There is that favorite expression that the Germans are so fond of, when they really mean that they want to take all their neighbors have, and give up nothing themselves, "Peace without annexations or indemnities," that expression that wrecked Russia.

We do not all realize that Abraham was the first one to lay down this maxim. If we read the account of his going to war to defend Lot, as contained in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis, we shall find that when he returned, a victorious leader, and the king of Sodom proposed a division of the spoils, that Abraham replied to his comrade in arms, "I will not take from a thread to a shoe latchet, I will not take anything, lest thou shouldst say I have made Abram rich" (vs. 23).

Last year we thought that we had made a wonderful innovation upon established customs, and that President Wilson was verging upon radicalism when he appointed Herbert Hoover to what we thought was a new office, that of food administrator. But, dear me, the President was only taking a leaf out of the Bible. Read the forty-first chapter of Genesis and there you will find the first food administrator in the world, and it will interest you to see how well Joseph conserved the food of Egypt and saved that country from famine.

Gideon was the first real master of "camouflage" (though he had to divide this honor with the Greeks at the siege of Troy). Study the seventh chapter of the Book of Judges, beginning at verse 15, and see if any of the plans devised upon the battlefields of France for camouflaging guns or troops exceed in ingenuity or resources the plan adopted by Gideon to make the Midianites believe that they were surrounded by an innumerable host.

We have just adopted stern measures to put a stop to loafing and make people go to work.

"A new thing this," somebody says. "The world is moving very rapidly."

But turn to the third chapter of the Second Epistle to the Thessalonians and see how briefly but sternly St. Paul states this same policy when he says "that if any would not work, neither shall he eat."

Oh, my, no, there is nothing out of date about the Bible in these stirring times in which we live.

It is the latest, most up-to-date book there is, and we are only just catching up with it.

Who knows, we may even come abreast of that great time when it was said of the Christians, "Neither said any of them that ought of the things which he possessed was his own, but they had all things in common" (Acts 4:34). Anyway, every time the government takes possession of a railroad or a telegraph line or any other great industry it is bringing us just so much nearer to that state of things, so let the good work go on. We may yet catch up with the Bible.

IN THE ASCENDING SCALE.

Nothing can better illustrate and emphasize the difference in the standards and ideals of the armies at war than the words addressed to those armies by their respective leaders.

No great fighting force can be expected to rise above the standard set for it by its commanders.

The three following general orders issued by the Kaiser, Lord Kitchener and General Pershing shed a bright light upon the kind of conduct that might be expected from the soldiers to whom they were addressed.

On August 19, 1914, the Kaiser issued the following order from his headquarters at Aix La Chapele:

"It is my Royal and Imperial Command that you concentrate your energies, for the immediate present, upon one single purpose, and that is that you address all the skill and all the valor of my soldiers to exterminate first the treacherous English and walk over General French's contemptible little army."

That foe which he called "treacherous" and "contemptible" is still before him and has vigorously declined to be "walked over."

Lord Kitchener's order issued about the same time is too long to quote in full, but the following extracts will show the splendid standard set before the British soldiers, a standard to which they have scrupulously lived, in most cases:

"You are ordered abroad as a soldier of the King to help our French comrades against the invasion of a common enemy. It will be your duty, not only to set an example of discipline and perfect steadiness under fire, but also to maintain the most friendly relations with those whom you are helping in this struggle.

"Be invariably courteous, considerate and kind. Never do anything likely to injure or destroy property, and always look upon looting as a disgraceful act.

"Your duty cannot be done unless your health is sound. So keep constantly on your guard against excesses. In this new experience you may find temptation both in wine and women. You must entirely resist both temptations, and while treating all women with perfect courtesy, you should avoid any intimacy.

"Do your duty bravely, fear God, honor the King.

"KITCHENER,
"Field Marshal."

Noble and inspiring as are these words from the great leader who has since gone to a watery grave, yet the general order issued by General Pershing transcends it both in loftiness of thought and concise manliness. Indeed for power of expression this order of our commanding general in the field seems to us to be a masterpiece of English.

Listen to this leader speaking to his soldiers:

"Hardship will be your lot, but trust in God will be your comfort; temptation will befall you, but the teachings of our Saviour will give you strength.

"Let your valor as a soldier and your conduct as a man be an inspiration to your comrades and an honour to your country.

"J. J. PERSHING."

Further comment is superfluous and can add nothing to such a message.

The Right Life.

The end of life is not to do good, although many of us think so. It is not to win souls, although I once thought so. The end of life is to do the will of God. How can you build up your life on that principle? Let me give you an outline of a little Bible reading.

The object of life. "I come to do Thy will, O God."

The first thing you need after life is food. "My meat is to do the will of Him that sent me."

The next thing you need after food is society. "He that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother." You want education. "Teach me to do Thy will, O God." You want pleasure. "I delight to do Thy will, O God." A whole life can be built upon the one vertical column and then, when all is over, "He that doeth the will of God abideth forever."—Henry Drummond.

Seventh Sunday After Trinity: The command to destroy the Canaanites contained in the first lesson for Sunday morning is one of those Old Testament passages which grate on modern sensibilities. More than that, the effort which a certain powerful nation is now making to "put over" on the world its system of "Kultur" at the point of the sword has caused a revolution of feeling against the whole idea of any nation's regarding itself as having a mission in the world. All this has its bearing on the Lectionary problem. Even before this war many persons favored the omission from the public reading of the Scriptures of passages like those in Deuteronomy 7:2, 16. Nor is it to be denied that these and similar passages have been the occasion if not cause of much harm in the world. On the other hand, it may be urged that we ought to face facts and know history; ought to be put in a position to appreciate "the pit whence we have been digged." Not otherwise can we understand either the fact or the method of progress or know the distinctive and inestimable privilege of living under the Christian dispensation. Science itself comes to our help here. If it be true that the doctrine of evolution has been a great stimulus alike to thought and activity, as applied to history in general and all life, why should we deprive ourselves of a similar benefit in the realm of religion and revelation? Moreover, a comparison of Biblical and other history will bring out that in the former are contained elements not in the other; since it attains to a Christ and a Church, the weapons of whose warfare are not carnal. More even than this. There is contained even in the Old Testament a history of the soul; something more than "philosophy teaching by example." If we allow our Risen Lord to open our minds to understand the Scriptures, we find in Deuteronomy 7 a much needed exhortation today to overcome all evil; to compromise with no injustice; and at the same time to remember that the elimination of all sin, whether in ourselves, the Church or the world, is something that can be accomplished only gradually, "by little and little." There is no instantaneous salvation even for the redeemed and converted.

This latter truth is the kernel of the second lesson. St. Paul, writing a quarter of a century after his conversion, did not regard himself as having attained, but gave all his efforts to strive toward the mark. These two lessons fit the petition of the Collect for growth and perseverance even to the end.

The evening lessons are founded upon the teaching of the Epistle that redemption is unto liberty, with a view to so using our liberty as to attain unto that freedom which is complete deliverance from sin. The children of Israel had been redeemed from Egyptian bondage (morning lesson), but they were also to carry with them into the Promised Land the ideal of liberty. On the fiftieth year they were to "proclaim liberty throughout the land," and to "return every man to his possession"; an act of social justice which might mitigate at least the possibility of tyranny inhering in an imperfect social state. The second lesson teaches what true freedom is, loving conformity to the truth of man's being (perhaps shorten to verses 12-36).

31. Wednesday.

Collect for Seventh Sunday After Trinity.

Lord of all power and might, Who art the Author and Giver of all good things; Graft in our hearts the love of Thy Name, increase in us true religion, nourish us with all goodness, and of Thy great mercy keep us in the same; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

9. For what does He pray? Jno. 17.
10. What are you doing to realize a share in His answers? 1 Jno. 1:3; 3:24; 5:18; Col 3:12-15.

Note: Christ's great desire was to prepare His disciples for the bitter experiences before them; to institute the Christian passover; He changed the Paschal rite into an Evangelical Sacrament of His Body and Blood. These become to the soul what bread and wine are to the body, symbol and vehicle of spiritual feeding (Edersheim). Teacher Training Course; Lesson 9: read Dr. Caley's book, pp. 118, 119.

The New York Bible Society has distributed more than 100,000 Testaments and 50,000 Gospel portions, including Psalms of David, to the men. A second 100,000 Testaments have been ordered and will be distributed as soon as delivered. The Society is making a special effort to see that every man going from New York Harbor to the other side is offered a Testament before he starts. A representative official of one of the large transports recently wrote: "I shall take great pleasure in distributing the 1,500 copies of the New Testament, with the messages from General Pershing and Colonel Roosevelt. There will be many opportunities of conversation with some of the men on the way over. These books will be much appreciated, and this is a most timely and welcome gift."—Episcopal Recorder.

The Illuminating Power of Prayer.

Prayer illuminates the path of duty. After a busy day in Capernaum Jesus rose early the following morning for prayer. The townspeople sought Him out and besought Him not to go away, but to stay and work among them. To one of us such a call would have brought real temptation. To stay would give us a real home and save us from a wandering, itinerant life. It would offer a willing and responsive field instead of hard refusals and rejections. It would enable us to show by a demonstration in one community what might be done for all. Would it not be difficult for us to know our duty in such a case? Jesus had been praying and not for one moment was the missionary character of His work obscured. Prayer then has always made duty absolutely clear.—R. E. Speer.

The Flowers of Europe.

N. B. T.

The little wild flowers
That grow across the world,
With delicate petals
And leaves light curled,
Harshly they fare now,
In trampled field and wood,
All blackened with powder
And dampened with blood.
The old rains of summer
Are mingled with steel,
The old winds of summer
Are flame, now, to feel.
Shell torn and shattered,
Do they still stand,
The little wild flowers
In that strange, strange land?

Yea, they are valiant,
So men say.
They look up to heaven
In the old glad way.
Pink flower, white flower,
Scarlet bloom,
They nod and are fearless
At the feet of doom;
Buttercup, daisy,
Frail bluebell,
They smile and are safe
At the gate of hell.
Bright on a trench's lip,
Sweet on a grave,
The little wild flowers
Are faithful and brave.

Thus hath it been,
And thus shall it be—
There were little wild flowers
On Calvary.
There was earthquake and darkness,
But daunted no wise,
They awakened at Easter
To see Christ arise.
The little wild flowers
Write on the sod
"Beauty cannot perish While there is God."
This is their message,
Deathless and sure,
"While pain endureth
Love shall endure!"

Aunt Rhoda's Afternoon Off.

It had become a sort of legend in the Graham household that Aunt Rhoda needed a change and must have one. The five orphan nieces and nephews with whom she lived had a spasmodic way of bringing up the subject and then forgetting it.

"You know, auntie," Lucia, the married niece, would remonstrate, "people have no right to bury themselves alive. Think how you stay here year in and year out. Be a dear, now, and let us get you ready for a little run to sea-shore or mountains."

"Lucia is right," Rosalie always agreed, with her airy little emphasis. "However, you'll never go unless you make a definite effort of the will." Rosalie's leaning to psychology went oddly with her butterfly ways. "The idea of your turning down Cousin Alma's beautiful invitation; such a chance doesn't come to everybody."

Here School Girl Lettice was likely to strike in with the noisy comment that she wished somebody would urge her to take a trip. Alan, her twin, was of the opinion that auntie would never budge until she was bounced.

His advice was to creep in on her some night as she nodded over her sewing and take her away, tagged, to be shipped on the first east-bound train.

Miss Rhoda, moving softly to and fro on nameless small errands, would smile quietly. "Well, well, I'll take a jaunt some day when I can see my way clearer," was her invariable reply.

This answer always irritated Paul, the young business man of the family, whose word usually carried much weight. When at length the family doctor pronounced Miss Rhoda slightly run down and tired, Paul was almost ready to scold. "Now see here, Aunt Rhoda, this is the way to do. Don't stop for frills. Just pick up some day and walk off, without a word or a sign. Vamoose, disappear—that's the idea."

Miss Rhoda sighed, now and then. She was conscious of a secret wish, which she would not own, that her brood were more active about remembering various other important things. On this particular August day she smiled, as always, and turned the heel of a sock in silence.

"You don't even take what Alan calls a 'lay-off,'" Lucia continued, her voice like a wounded dove's. "Why shouldn't you? We have a competent cook, a doctor next door, a telephone, and everything else necessary for keeping us alive. Really, Aunt Rhoda—" The reproachful voice trailed off petulantly. Something else had attracted Lucia's attention for the time.

Miss Rhoda took her way down town early the next afternoon, with a crowded list. She felt vaguely oppressed, for Alan had broached the topic again at breakfast, and Paul had grown sarcastic. Besides, the weather was warm, and there were many things to be seen to. It was never possible to order over the telephone vegetables crisp enough for Paul or fruit that pleased Rosalie. Then Alan's room needed new curtains, and Lettie's shoes must be half-soled. Miss Rhoda checked off on her fingers ten different errands.

She trotted about busily, doubling on her own trail a dozen different times; it was late when she started for the car. The street was so hot that she found herself glancing enviously toward shadowy arcade of a little moving picture place. She mentally measured the distance to the shimmering car tracks. "I'll just drop in long enough to get my breath," she said. She turned aside into the hospitable retreat. The ticket-girl, bored and weary, regarded her latest patron with expressionless eyes. "Cowboys an' Indians," she said stolidly when Miss Rhoda asked what the show was about. "Well, I declare," replied Miss Rhoda, her old gray eyes twinkling. "cowboys will suit me to a dot! Don't you get tired, dearie, sitting here so long?"

The grumpy little ticket-seller relaxed into a smile. "O, pretty tired, thank you. Make the usher show you to a good seat."

The transition from street to theatre was like plunging from a strip of burning beach into a cool, dark cave. Miss Rhoda stumbled a little before her pupils accustomed themselves to the gloom. It was not until she was comfortably seated in a side row, directly under the grateful whirring of an electric fan, that her vision cleared. The place was quite crowded, she saw, but the next chair was vacant, and she put down her bundles with a sigh of relief and pushed back her bonnet.

It was not long before her household worries were quite forgotten and the romance of the flickering screen held her fast. Once in awhile she sat bolt upright, and several times her laughter broke, as spontaneous as a child's. "O, I'm glad they didn't shoot him!" she cried, at a certain crisis.

An old gentleman in front twitched one shoulder. "So am I, madam," he answered. "It would have been an outrage."

The dim, hazy place was really delightful, Miss Rhoda thought. "Let me see," she said to herself, closing her eyes for an instant, conscience stricken. "I've done all the children's little commissions, I believe, and ordered the fruit and vegetables right, and exchanged the books at the library." . . . Her fingers numbered the packages unconsciously. "But I mustn't stay much longer. Alan is bringing home one of his school friends to tea, and Martha will never remember to have muffins unless I remind her. Rosalie's yellow silk underslip must be mended, too, before she dresses for the concert. I'll move along presently."

The piano and violin swept into a soft tune, half ballad, half lullaby. "Used to sing Alan to sleep to that," she murmured drowsily. She opened her eyes with an effort, and it occurred to her vaguely that the cowboys were behaving in a rather strange manner. To all appearances they had climbed into a grove of cocoanut palms and were gesticulating like monkeys. "Must be moving along in a minute," Miss Rhoda said again, or thought she said.

When next her eyes opened, slowly, the breath of the electric fan had cooled by ten degrees. She pulled her bonnet over her chilly forehead and sat up straighter. The screen was still flickering whitely; a cowboy rode through blowing sage-grass, and signalled wildly to another horseman. "What's he doing that again for?" she asked herself. "And upon my word," she added, as a sentence flashed on the film, "he's saying the same thing again, too!"

She looked around. The crowd had thinned strangely, the music was trickling away into a little monotonous tune. "There!" she yawned, "I'll start home right away. What's the use of waiting to see the rest of a play that keeps repeating itself? Besides, I feel wonderfully refreshed now."

At the doorway she almost dropped her precious packages. Instead of the broad bright afternoon glare, a mist of blue-gray dusk enveloped her. The air was cool and fresh, and starry lights were beginning to twinkle at every corner. The loud bustle of business was over, and the streets full of those clearer, more sharply defined noises that mark early twilight in town. The tired ticket-seller was gone and a long-nosed, sour-looking individual had taken her place. "Mercy!" Miss Rhoda ejaculated. Then the truth came to her slowly and she gave a rueful little chuckle. "I'm like Rip Van Winkle, for all the world," she said aloud. Her progress down the square was almost an undignified scurry.

At the corner a hearty voice stopped her, and she looked up to see Lucia's husband, Harry Crane, bringing his automobile to a standstill. He jumped out and opened the door.

"What on earth are you doing downtown this time o' evening?" he asked, laughing at her dismayed countenance.

Miss Rhoda resolved instantly to put a bold face on a rather doubtful matter. "I'm just out of moving pictures," she explained.

Her nephew-in-law threw back his head and laughed again. "Well, I'm taking you straight to another moving picture. They're all fuming at home—can't find you and haven't a notion where you are."

Miss Rhoda peered at a clock in a jeweler's window. "Why, however did it get to be after eight?" she said, faintly.

"The same way it does every day," answered Harry Crane. "Aunt Rhody, I believe you've been asleep!"

"I—I reckon you're about right, Harry," his companion confessed, and forced herself to join in his laughter. "Are they so worried?" she asked. Then, after a few moment's reflection, she brightened visibly. "But, Harry, it's been some time since you saw them, hasn't it? And I've just thought of something. When I came downtown today I brought my best suit and several other things in a suit-case to the cleaner's. Do you know what they're thinking now? Why, that I've gone off on that trip they're always trying to persuade me into taking, of course!"

"H'm . . . well, I don't know," Harry responded doubtfully. "Anyway, here we are." He slowed down, and Miss Rhoda got out with slow dignity. As she approached, a shadowy group on the porch resolved itself into four figures and four voices began to speak at once. At the top of the steps Lucia seized her lightly by both shoulders.

"Why, Aunt Rhoda!" she cried. Her tone was pleasant, but it had ever so slight an edge. "Did you forget that that young Mr. and Mrs. Bruce were coming to tea? I know I told you. Martha got sulky and everything threatened to go wrong, so I simply telephoned them to come another time."

In the gloom Aunt Rhoda looked stricken. Incredibly, the young bridal couple had completely slipped her memory.

"Lance Tracy was here," Lucia's aggrieved voice continued, "and Paul said that he hoped the next time Alan had company some older person would be present to keep down the noise."

"I couldn't get to the rehearsal of the League play," Lettice put in, as Alan began to expostulate with Lucia. "Because, Aunt Rhoda, you didn't come with that flamagee stuff for my costume. Speaking of costumes, Rosalie's upstairs having a struggle over that silk slip she hasn't the first idea how to mend."

Paul came running up the steps, two at a time. "O, she's here!" he said with relief in his tone. "Aunt Rhoda, where have you been? When the eighty-two car came without you I was upset, sure enough." He looked worried in the dim light, and Miss Rhoda felt a sharp qualm. In spite of the assumed lightness of their greeting, they had bothered a good deal, poor children!

She sank into the swing. "I didn't mean to scare you," she faltered. "But I can't see, exactly, why you should have worried, dearies. Things had fitted in so nicely, you see: I happened to take my suit-case of best clothes down to the cleaner's, and naturally that pointed to my having left on the trip you are all so anxious for me to take. Why should you have troubled, after you looked in my room and found the clothes gone?"

In Miss Rhoda's flute-like old voice there was not the faintest touch of irony, only a sort of wistful bewilderment. She turned to Lucia. "I don't quite see," she said.

Lucia, who was standing in the direct light from the hall, for once in her self-confident young life looked utterly taken aback. "I—we didn't look in your room," she said, after a pause.

An uncomfortable little silence fell. Aunt Rhoda still looked gently puzzled, and the little company fidgeted.

"Seems to be a sort of a misunderstanding all around," Lucia's husband offered genially after a moment, and drifted, whistling, into the dark. He hoped his young in-laws were going to have sense enough to see themselves in their proper light.

Alan spoke up suddenly. "Seems to me we've all been a little 'off.'"

Aunt Rhoda's oldest nephew rose slowly from his seat on the step. "I reckon you're about right," he agreed. "Aunt Rhody, we haven't been so dreadfully cut up as we sound—for, after all, gentle-faced old dears like you are not likely to come to harm in our peaceful town this time o' day. The shameful truth is that what sent us all up into the air was not having you here to do for us!" He turned to the others. "Now you know that's the truth!"

Lettie's frank face flushed. "It sounds like it," she acknowledged. "We'd have gone wild if we'd thought Auntie in any danger; but what we've been ranting about was really our own helplessness."

Lucia slid an impulsive arm about Miss Rhoda's shoulders, bending low. "Just a lot of infants," she whispered. "And I married, and the biggest baby of all!"

"What gets me," observed Paul, as they moved into the house, "is the way we charge and champ about her needing a change, and then, when she goes off for an afternoon, not only become perfectly demoralized without her, but even forget that she might have followed our sage advice."

Alan shot him a mischievous glance. "Don't delay for frills," he quoted. "Pick up and walk off, bag and baggage. Vamoose, disappear!"

His brother grinned. "Yes, I said it. Don't rub it in, Bud."

Lettice gave a tomboy lunge and seized her little old aunt. "Now that we've all owned up," she cried, "tell us this. Where were you?"

Miss Rhoda blinked. Lucia had seated her at the supper table and was serving the tea, a little clumsily; Paul had gently removed her packages. It was seldom that the children pelted her: it was more than seldom that they waited on her little needs. The shoe was generally on the other foot.

"Where were you?" Lettice demanded again.

"Why, let me see," Aunt Rhoda hesitated. For the moment she had really forgotten. Slowly, laughter flooded her sweet old face. "At moving pictures," she said, "seeing cowboys and Indians. It was the loveliest picture play I ever went to. And," she added, chuckling, "the longest!"

FAMILIAR HYMNS.

VIII. My Faith Looks Up to Thee.

If a roomful of people were suddenly bidden to mention a hymn at random, there is little doubt but that a very large number would name "My Faith Looks Up to Thee," so widespread and loving a popularity that hymn enjoys, and so representative it is of gospel singing everywhere. It can probably be safely called the greatest hymn ever written by an American.

The poem was the work of Ray Palmer, of New England, one time clerk in a Boston dry-goods store, later a minister of the Congregational Church. He was only twenty-two years old at the time of its composition. For two years the words remained scribbled in a small note-book kept by the author for devotional purposes; then one day Palmer met on the street, apparently by the merest chance, Lowell Mason, the well-known musician. The composer was in need of a hymn for a collection that he was compiling, and stepping into a nearby building, the other copied the words of "Nearer, My God, to Thee," and handed them to him. Mason wrote the tune Olivet for the poem, and therewith was launched a song that even Christendom will never outlive.

Palmer said of his poem, "It was born of my soul." It is recorded that when we had finished writing the stanzas he burst into tears—moved, we can readily believe, by the prophetic realization of what his words would mean to the world.

My faith looks up to Thee,
Thou Lamb of Calvary,
Saviour divine!
Now hear me while I pray;
Take all my guilt away;
Oh, let me from this day
Be wholly Thine!

May Thy rich grace impart
Strength to my fainting heart,
My zeal inspire;
As Thou hast died for me,
O may my love to Thee
Pure, warm and changeless be,
A living fire.

While life's dark maze I tread,
And griefs around me spread,
Be Thou my guide;
Bid darkness turn to day;
Wipe sorrow's tears away;
Nor let me ever stray
From Thee aside!

When ends life's transient dream,
When death's cold, sullen stream
Shall o'er me roll;
Blest Saviour, then in love,
Fear and distrust remove;
O bear me safe above,
A ransomed soul!

Men are free in proportion to the number of spheres of obedience that they can fill. Laws are not shackles to impede, but tools and harness to assist human force. The peculiarity of our early ancestry was not that they loved liberty; everything in heaven, on earth and in the sea does that; but that they discerned the royal fact, which others had missed who threw off the law to find liberty, that by taking on law men are free. Obedience to God's law is the highest liberty to which humanity may ever reach.—H. W. Beecher.

After All.

Blackberries big as thimbles,
Peaches yellow as gold,
Crowds of fluttering daisies
Thick as the hills will hold;
Bluebirds' song in the treetops,
Meadows tumbled with hay—
If only beautiful Summer
Could always stay!

Yet nuts are ripening slowly
And apples are growing sweet;
Crickets will soon be playing
Their wee flutes at our feet;
Leaves will be colored and lovely,
And silver frosts will fall—
We couldn't spare sweet Autumn
After all!

Home-Made Service.

The Dickenson twins flattened their noses against the window and scraped their lashes on the glass.

"It's raining!" Don observed, but Daisy said nothing; she knew that the round, pearly drop was not a raindrop, but a tear.

"I'd just as soon for it to storm, anyway," Don went on, "as long as we can't get away. I'd rather, wouldn't you?"

Howard, their cousin, who was several years older than they, threw down his book with an impatient sigh. "I just wish," he said, crossly, "that before I came here and got shut up in quarantine, I'd bought a ticket for Alaska, or Guinea, or some other jumping-off place!"

As Howard had made this speech several times a day ever since little Stella went down with scarlet fever, Don and Daisy did not answer. They felt sorry for him, but then they felt sorry for themselves, too, and mostly they were sorry for little red Stella, shut away in a lonesome room with only mother and the trained nurse. It was hard to be patient, though, and presently two gusty sighs from the window broke the silence again.

"O, dear!" said Daisy, with a little tremor in her voice. "I wish I hadn't seen Pauline Gray going by. She makes me think of the entertainment and my Red Cross dress and—and—" She choked suddenly, and could not finish.

This was to have been a great night for Daisy. Dressed as a tiny Red Cross nurse, she was to have taken part in the war relief entertainment at the hall. It seemed the most beautiful thing in the world to wear the white costume and the scarlet sign; with all her heart Daisy longed to be big enough to go and serve among the wounded on the battle field, and somehow this was coming fairly close to it. But now she must give up the wonderful pleasure; Pauline Gray would take her place and her dress. . . . She leaned against the window again, and this time a perfect shower of drops wet the pane.

Don did not notice her; he was busy with his own troubles. The boys' part in the entertainment included marching and drilling in soldier costume. Don longed to be a soldier; he read and talked and dreamed of soldiers. To think of all the other fellows as they would be tonight was tough indeed. "I wish I were ten years older," he said. "I'd enlist before an hour was over. I'd—"

Howard burst out laughing. "No, you wouldn't," he said: "You'd go on being shut up in quarantine, exactly as you are now. Say, I know how we can have some fun! Where's your soldier suit, Don? I'm going to dress up in it and be a general, and you two can be soldier and nurse, as long as you're so crazy about it. That will be fine."

The twins were astonished. They looked at big Howard a full half a minute without replying. "Why, how in the world could you get into Don's suit?" asked Daisy. "A ten-year size for a fourteen-year-old boy?"

"I should say so!" added Don, indignantly. "You'd ruin it." He looked wistful. "But let's play the game, anyhow. I'll wear the clothes and you can pretend you have on a general's costume."

Howard laughed in a superior way. "Not on your life!" he said. "Of course I can squeeze into your suit. What's more, I know where it is, and I'm going to put it on—right over my other clothes." He started for the closet.

Don's little face flamed. "You know that mother would not let you," he said. "Howard, don't you touch my soldier suit."

Howard was a born tease. Although he had not cared for the plan in the least, the sight of his small cousin, flushed and defiant, made him determined to carry out his threat. He flung open the closet door.

Daisy's lip trembled. "Shame on you, Howard!" she cried, and stamped her foot. This from gentle Daisy finished the older boy: he would have the soldier suit now, or know the reason why.

But Don was too quick for him. With a dash the little fellow was in the closet and had snatched the suit down from its place on the shelf. He was darting out, under Howard's arm, when the bigger boy caught him.

"Oho, so you're going to take it from me by main force!" he said. Still laughing, and meaning no harm beyond his selfish mischievousness, he grabbed the garments and thrust his cousin back against the wall. They stood facing each other, both panting a little. Howard held the clothes high. "Why don't you say something?" he laughed.

Don was very pale now, but he held his shoulders straight. It was plain that he was having a tremendous struggle with himself. He knew that there were sharp things to be said to Howard—things that would probably make him forget his mischief. The boy was not a favorite in Belville, and Don had overheard conversations that would make him wince. He was well aware that if he hinted at this, Howard's curiosity would overcome him, and he would agree to give up the soldier suit if Don would tell the rest.

In a queer way he seemed to read his little cousin's mind. "Go ahead!" he said. "Bet you've got no end of bouquets to hand me. I'm ready."

"I can't do it," Don decided, to himself. "It wouldn't be honest—and it would be small." He stood silent.

"I'm going to ask mother to make him stop," said Daisy suddenly. She started toward the door.

"Come back, Daisy," Don said, at once. He hated tales, and besides, Stella must not be disturbed. Then he looked at Howard's long legs and big body. "You shall not wear my soldier suit!" he repeated.

Howard was taking off his coat. "Well, show me why not," he answered, calmly. "It's a nice suit, and I'll make a bully looking general." He pulled out the sword from the little scabbard and brandished it. Then he stooped to unlace his shoes.

Instantly Don was upon him, his hand on the clothes. Daisy clapped her hands, but she looked anxious. The scuffle was sharp, but it came to a sudden and unexpected end. In some way the small sword played a part that was not planned for it. All at once Don stumbled back with a big gash in his forehead. Blood was flowing freely from the wound, and the boy looked white.

Howard stood aghast; he was as pale now as Don. Then he threw down everything and rushed to the window; the sight of blood always made him feel faint.

Daisy's eyes flashed. For once in her life she was not gentle. Helping Don to the lounge, she turned on Howard. "You go for mother and Miss Pearson!" she said. "Don't you wait a minute, either." Then she filled the wash basin with cold water and began to bathe her brother's forehead.

Poor Howard, sober and alarmed, was willing enough to go. When he returned with his aunt and the nurse, he was looking wholesomely ashamed. "It was all my fault, Aunt Margaret," he owned. "I wasn't playing fair with the old chap, I know."

Don opened his eyes. "All I wanted was for you to let my soldier suit alone," he said. "You know I'm daffy about being a soldier."

Howard cleared his throat. The boy was good at heart, and his little cousin's behavior had genuinely touched him. "If gaining a victory is a sign of being a soldier, you're some soldier, I guess," he said. "You fought yourself as hard as you fought me."

Daisy's angry eyes were calm again as she watched Miss Pearson wash and bind her brother's forehead. "O, how lovely to be a nurse!" she breathed, admiringly.

Miss Pearson gave the last bandage a deft pat. "You'll make a good one," she said, "if you always do as well as you did with Don."

Both children smiled into their mother's eyes. "There," said mother, "I'm quite proud! And what do you think? They've telephoned and the entertainment is to be postponed because of threatening rain. It will come off next Thursday night instead of tonight, and by that time the quarantine will be lifted."

Don and Daisy cheered together. "I speak to treat the Red Cross nurse and one of the soldiers in Company A," said Howard. "It's not much for a fellow to do, but it's better than nothing."

Our Bible Games.

It was Sunday afternoon. The family was gathered in the cozy sitting room, reading or occasionally exchanging a few words. Snow began to fall soon after they returned from church, and the now raging storm was bringing an early twilight. As the room grew dim, first grandfather, and later the younger ones, laid down their books or papers and looked out at the storm, or sat quietly thinking.

"Let's play our Bible game," said ten-year-old Alice, nestling up to her mother. "You begin, grandpa."

Grandpa returned from a mental ex-curstion into the past, and as a mighty blast swept the trees he said, "And he arose and rebuked the wind, and said unto the sea, 'Peace, be still.'"

Mother followed with, "And he saw them toiling in rowing for the wind was contrary to them."

Then Alice, "Ask and it shall be given you."

"A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another," repeated grandma, softly.

"And all things whatsoever ye ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive," put in father, with conviction.

The boy of fifteen remembered his teacher's talk in class that day, and said, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

"Now B. grandpa," prompted Alice.

"Yes, child," said grandpa. "Be strong in the Lord, and in the power of His might."

"Blessed are the peacemakers," continued mother.

Then there was a wait for Alice to think. All at once she burst out with, "Be ye kind one to another."

"Better is a dinner of herbs where love is, than a stalled ox, and hatred therewith," said grandma.

"Be ye steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord." This from father.

"Can't seem to think of any," said the boy.

"Oh, yes, you can. Don't hurry."

After a pause, the boyish voice gave, "Blessed are the pure in heart."

"You could hardly have done better," said his father.

Long before they reached the W's, the room was dark, but the game was so pleasant that no one cared. Indeed, the darkness and the storm were the best setting for the thoughts that gathered around the dear familiar words. Even the children felt the influence of the tender and the strong messages.

When they had finished this list, mother proposed a round with one verse for each letter, and began, "Abide in me and I in you."

"Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth is Mount Zion," came promptly from grandpa, for in this game the first to think of a verse gave it.

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden," quoted Alice.

All puzzled in silence over the next letter, but at last grandma said, "Daughter, be of good comfort; thy faith hath made thee whole."

"Enter in at the straight gate," said the boy, and father ended the first round with "Fear not, for I am with thee.—Eliza F. Miller, in Continent.

Smart Aleck and the Owl.

It is a pity, when a boy is smart enough to stand at the head of his class and take the prize and be exempt from examinations, that he isn't smart enough to know that he doesn't know everything. That was Aleck May. The other boys and girls didn't mind Aleck's being head and taking the prize, but it fretted them somewhat that Aleck should pretend to know everything about everything. So they couldn't help being tickled when the owl "put one over," as they said, on Aleck.

A lot of boys and girls from the third grade were walking along College Street on their way from school when Aleck cried out: "Oho! Look at that stuffed owl in Jarvin's window! Ain't he a sight?"

"What's the matter with him?" asked Ted. "I think he looks all right."

"Not much; he doesn't look all right," answered Aleck scornfully. "Look at his legs. They are not straight; the bird man has just stuck slanting sticks in for legs. How could he walk on those things?"

The other children were silenced, not knowing much about owls. No more did Aleck; but a little thing like that didn't silence him. "And will you see how the bird man has twisted his head almost around to the back of his neck!" Aleck continued in the same scornful tone: "Why, it would break his neck if he were a live bird."

Just then the great horned owl in Jarvin's window slowly turned its tufted head around to the front and fixed its yellow eyes on Aleck. The girls screamed, and the boys backed off a little; but Aleck stood still, his lower jaw dropped, his eyes almost as big as the owl's. "Great Jiminy Crickets, if the fellow ain't alive!" he exclaimed and set out quickly for home to escape the jeers of the crowd.

Aleck did not escape. For weeks to come he had to stand being asked about owl's legs and heads by the boys and girls in the third grade.

But Aleck showed his sense in two ways: he took the teasing in good humor, and he learned to be much slower about claiming that he knew everything. Could you beat that?—Elizabeth Preston Allen, in The Visitor.

Johnny's Garden.

I'm going to have a garden, yes; but you need not suppose That in it will be planted a tulip or a rose;

For I am going to purchase the plants that I like the best, And here's a list of some of them; I've not thought up the rest.

I'm very fond of oyster stew and oysters broiled or fried, And so I'll have an oyster plant, to keep me well supplied.

And as I just love omelets, and sometimes hens won't lay, A thrifty eggplant I'll set out, and pick the eggs each day.

Then I'm very fond of pies, and they're kept out of reach, So I'll have three large pie plants, an apple, mince and peach.

And I shall have a rubber plant; and when there's rain or frost, I'll just run out and pick a pair, for mine are always lost.

Another plant I want to buy—I've never seen it yet— But seems to me it would be wise some candystuff to get.

And so, you see, I've thought up all the things that I like best; And, as I said, I haven't yet decided on the rest.

—Youth's Companion.

A Disagreeable Weakness.

"If there's an uncomfortable chair in the room, trust Etta to find it."

The friend who did not know Etta looked a little puzzled. "You mean she's so self-sacrificing," she suggested.

"No, I don't mean that," the answer came with derision. "I hardly know how to describe it. Perhaps you'll think I'm a little uncharitable to say that Etta loves to play the martyr, but it really seems that way."

The friend looked interested, and after a moment the speaker went on:

"We went to a picnic once at West Lake and got caught in a shower on the way. But after it had cleared up we had our luncheon just as we had planned and everybody was as gay as a lark but Etta. She sat looking as if she were trying to have a good time, and at last some one suggested that she wasn't eating much, Etta said those wet sandwiches spoiled her appetite."

"Wet sandwiches?" the friend repeated in horror.

"Yes, wasn't it awful? It seems that during the shower it had rained into one of the baskets and a number of sandwiches got a good soaking. But of course we had plenty of dry ones, more than we could possibly eat, as you always do at a picnic. But Etta had found the wet ones and had eaten enough to make her feel half-sick, and she never smiled again all that afternoon."

The friend laughed, but the girl was warning to her subject.

"Once a half a dozen of us girls camped for two weeks in the Green Mountains. Each girl had her own special work and Etta took making beds. And the last day we were up there it came out that making beds was the work she especially loathed. It gave her a headache to stoop over, she said. It seemed she would much rather have washed dishes, and the girls who had the dishes would have loved to change with her. That is what is so tiresome about Etta. She makes a martyr of herself without making anybody else happy or more comfortable."

"Yes, I know," said the friend. "Etta isn't the only one of her kind, my dear. Wherever you go you will find people with the same weakness for needless martyrdom. To love sacrifice, not in order to help some one else, but for its own sake, is a very disagreeable weakness."—Exchange.

The Homing Instinct of a Cat.

I have often heard of curious stories of wonderful return journeys made by cats and dogs to their masters or old homes, but I have never experienced this myself until the other day. It happened thus:

In February, 1916, our soldier son, while on leave from the front, bought at Selfridge's, London, a beautiful Persian kitten as a present to his father, who is devoted to cats. Puss was called Marquis after his French cousins, this being (so our son said) the favorite name given to cats in France.

In July of the same year our whole household moved to a town twelve miles from our home for a month's holiday. The day we arrived Marquis took fright and, to our great regret, ran away and completely disappeared. Our distress was all the more intense when a week later our son laid down his life on the Somme.

On November 10, nearly one year and four months later, a lady brought a Persian cat to us which she found scratching at the window of her house a stone's throw away from ours. It was Marquis, who at once walked off to the kitchen, where he formerly lived, seeming to realize the household on the way. He took one sniff at his basket and curled himself in it again and generally behaved as if he had never for a moment been absent.—Spectator.

If you are praying for a revival, don't let somebody else do all the work.—Ex.

RESOLUTION.

At the March meeting of the Richmond Branch of the Leper Mission, it was proposed by Misses E. J. and Margaret Nolting and seconded by Misses Alice and Lou Leigh, that a child should be adopted in perpetual memory of our beloved President, Mrs. Landon R. Mason. This was unanimously agreed on and a little leper girl, aged four and one-half years, at Naini Asylum, Allahabad, India, has been chosen, to be known as the Lucy Ambler Mason Protegee, $20.00 a year. Truly "to live in hearts we leave behind is not to die."

op and the candidate presented by the Rev. C. J. De Coux, Archdeacon of the Diocese, who together with the Rev. Dr. McCandless and the Rev. Messrs. Cole and Drew united with the Bishop in the imposition of hands.

Personals: The Rev. Edward Henry Ward, D. D., after a rectorship extending over twenty-one years, has retired from St. Peter's Church, Pittsburgh. The vacancy has been filled by the calling of the Rev. Dr. Homer Abial Flint, of the Church of the Nativity, Crafton, who will enter upon his duties on October 1st.

The Rev. Earl Hunter Perry, M. D., of Trinity Church, Washington, has been given a commission as captain in the Medical Corps, and expects to enter into active service some time in July.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

Fort Worth: Mr. H. M. Marks, senior warden and active worker in Trinity parish, has recently been made the local General Secretary of the Y. M. C. A., and is believed to be the only civilian Churchman in the State of Texas in charge of Y. M. C. A. work. Miss Emma Childers, Secretary of the local Y. W. C. A., is also a Churchwoman and connected with St. Andrew's parish.

Bishop Moore confirmed a class of ten, eight soldiers and two officers' wives in Y. M. C. A. Hut 63, Camp Bowie, Friday evening, June 21. The rector and part of the vested choir of St. Andrew's held a brief service before the confirmation. The class, prepared by the Rev. E. H. Eckel and Chaplain F. R. Godolphin, was presented by the latter. To many of the soldiers in the well-filled hall the sight of a confirmation was a novel experience.

A class of twelve, the largest in the history of the institution, which is now eighteen years' old, was graduated from the nurses' school of All Saints' Hospital, Fort Worth, the evening of June 20. Bishop Moore and members of the medical faculty made addresses. Regret was felt at the absence of the chaplain, the Rev. Edwin Wickens, who is now eighty years of age and has been for some weeks a patient himself in the hospital. Announcement was made of the erection at an early date of a second home for nurses on the hospital grounds. All Saints' is a Diocesan institution, and an outgrowth of the devoted work of fifteen women of Trinity parish in connection with missionary extension in the city.

ALASKA.

Rt. Rev. P. T. Rowe, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop visited Sitka the second week in June and confirmed several persons presented by the Rev. G. E. Howard.

The Bishop also stopped at Douglas (Canon Butcher) and Juneau (Dean Christian), where an adult was confirmed; at Wrangell (the Rev. Harry Corser), where four adults were confirmed; and visited Ketchikan during the third week in June, where he confirmed eleven adults, including the wife of Mr. R. C. Jenkins, formerly a Congregational minister, who was ordained deacon by the Bishop two days later, after examination by the Rev. G. D. Christian, of Juneau, and the Rev. Harry Corser, of Wrangell.

The Bishop left Ketchikan for Seattle to catch the steamer for Nome in order to get to Point Hope and back to Nome before the ice closes in, and endeavoring to reach Fairbanks up the Yukon in the fall.

WYOMING.

Rt. Rev. Nat. S. Thomas, D. D., Bishop

Eleventh Annual Convocation.

The Eleventh Annual Convocation was held at Christ Church, Douglas, June 21st to 24th inclusive. The occasion was also a celebration of the Fiftieth Anniversary of Church Life in the Missionary District of Wyoming. The opening sermon was preached by Bishop Thomas, who gave a resume of the accomplishments of fifty years in Wyoming, reading extracts from letters of former workers in the District.

The Bishop's address dealt with the vital statistics of the year, and pointed out the fact that during fifty years of Church life in Wyoming but one man had offered himself from the District as a Candidate for Holy Orders, and he an Arapahoe Indian, the Rev. Sherman Coolidge. A special committee was appointed to consider the question of recruits for the ministry.

The Rev. C. C. Rollit, D. D., Provincial Secretary, addressed the Convocation on the Every-Member Campaign which is to be held in the District some time in November. A committee was appointed to co-operate with Dr. Rollit and give him all necessary assistance.

Two were ordained to the Diaconate and two advanced to the Priesthood on Sunday morning, June 23d. As a special act of courtesy the pastors of the Methodist and Congregationalist Churches closed their services and requested their congregations to attend the ordination. The pastors were invited to vest and take part in the procession, which they gladly did.

On Sunday afternoon special war intercessions were held, and a Missionary Rally occurred in the evening.

The House of Church Women met in connection with Convocation, under the direction of Mrs. N. S. Thomas.

The great regret of Convocation was that so many clergy and lay delegates were prevented by floods and wash-outs from being present. The following telegram was received by Bishop Thomas, and was greatly enjoyed by members of Convocation:

"Lander, Wyo., June 21, 1918.

"Through flood and mud about twenty of us are here, but there is a great gulf between us so that those who would pass from us to you cannot. Now unless the Convocation can pass from you to us, we are afraid we will not hear our Moses and the Prophets at this time. Express our regrets, and say to Convocation they need not trouble themselves to send any water. We are not dry."

Elections: The Rev. Guy E. Kagey, Secretary, and Mr. E. T. David, Treasurer of Convocation. Deputies to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. S. A. Huston, Frank J. Chipp, A. F. Schepp, Ph. D., Morten Joslin; and Messrs. W. W. Daley, A. C. Jones, W.

NEVADA.

Rt. Rev. G. C. Hunting, D. D., Bishop.

The Eleventh Annual Convocation of Nevada has just closed its sessions. All the clergy canonically resident and working in the State were present, and lay delegates representing more parishes and missions than usual. In his address the Bishop made an earnest appeal that all should work for prohibition, as the Church in Nevada be-

TRY THIS FOR YOUR HEALTH.

For diseases which do not readily yield to treatment, such as chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, rheumatism, Bright's disease, gall stones, uric acid poisoning, and diseases of the kidney and liver, the best physicians send their wealthy patients to the famous mineral springs. Some even spent months at the Spas of Europe and were almost invariably cured or greatly benefited.

I believe that the Shivar Spring is the greatest mineral spring ever discovered and I believe it so firmly that I offer to send you enough water for a three weeks' treatment (two five-gallon demijohns) on my guarantee that if it fails to benefit your case I will refund the price. You would hardly believe me if I told you that only about two out of a hundred, on the average, say that they have received no benefit. The water is restoring thousands. It restored my thought my case was incurable and I am willing and anxious for you to match your faith in the Spring against my pocketbook. If I win you become a life friend of the Spring. If I lose I will be sorry for you, but I will appreciate your courtesy in giving the water a trial and will gladly refund your money on request. Sign the following letter:

Shivar Spring,
Box 64-C, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Water. I agree to give it a fair trial in accordance with instructions contained in the booklet you will send, and if I report no benefit, you agree to refund the price of the water in full on receipt of the two empty demijohns which I agree to return within thirty days.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McA. Pittman.

gan the present campaign in the State; that we "clean up" Nevada against the time the soldiers return from the war; that an effort be made to get the next Legislature to enact laws concerning the reading of the Bible in the public schools and to change the form of marriage license so as to give previous marital condition, and that all answers be sworn to before the clerk of the court. The evening of the first day a missionary meeting was held with addresses on Indians and on Alaska.

In reply to a communication from Wyoming suggesting the formation of a new province, Nevada voted to remain with the Province of the Pacific.

The following resolution was passed: Resolved, That in our present day preaching there should be a renewed and vigorous appeal to "the wrath of God which is revealed from heaven against all unrighteousness of men," and to God's love not only as benevolent and healing, but also as a "consuming fire," and that the Bishop issue a pastoral in Advent along these lines.

Also that the Bishop appoint a committee to "consider fully and make report on some definite plan of beginning a Cathedral Foundation for Nevada, not only to give the Bishop his own rightful Church, but also to make it a bond of corporate and of spiritual unity which shall in its growth in coming time bind into one all the varied Christian forces of the State."

Plans were started for a celebration next year of the fiftieth anniversary of the consecration of Ozi W. Whitaker as Bishop of Nevada.

The Committee on the State of the Church reported at least some small growth in almost every phase of our work.

The Woman's Auxiliary held a special session. It was reported that the number of branches had more than doubled during the past year.

The next Convocation will meet in Reno on the last Sunday in January, 1919.

What Is a Christian?

"Christian" means simply a follower of Christ; and in the stern, unrelenting, and bitter war against evil we have need to forget our petty differences—yes, to forget even the differences which are not so petty—and to stand together against a common foe. It is not so necessary that every one think alike and act alike, but only that we "love one another with pure hearts fervently." The work of the Church and the Kingdom is not to be achieved by distrust and hatred of those who differ from us, but by truest Christian charity, resulting in most effective co-operation.—Christian Guardian.

FRECKLES

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department. Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Walking with God will always lead you toward man.

Living in the past only puts the headlight on the rear platform.

Whenever you speak evil of another you are sure to hurt yourself.

We are put into this world to make it better, and we must be about our business.

The secret of life is not to do what one likes, but to try to like what one has to do.

So many people are shaken by scientific doubts only because they don't know enough science.

Life never begins to be serious in the largest sense until we feel that we have a mission in the world.

"If I live as if there were no God—no God to protect, no God to console, no God to punish—what am I but the fool that said in his heart, 'There is no God?' What is the atheism of the lips compared with the atheism of the life?"—A. R. Wells.

There is no realm of our lives in which retrospection is occasionally more necessary than the realm of our motives. There is an awful danger of unsuspected insincerity in the life of every one of us of doing things for self when we profess them done for Jesus Christ.

Thank God every morning when you get up that you have something to do that day which must be done, whether you like it or not. Being forced to work and forced to do your best will breed in you temperance, self-control, diligence, strength of will, content and a hundred other virtues which the idle will never know.—Charles Kingsley.

God knows how my heart longs for the day in which it can be said, "It is Peace." But I would rather for the whole of the rest of my life, whatever it costs, be unable to say these blessed words until I could say the other and greater words about the task committed to us: "It is finished."—The Archbishop of York.

Just to leave in His dear hand
Little things,

All we cannot understand—

All that stings—

Just to let Him take the care

Sorely pressing,

Finding all we let Him bear

Changed to blessing.

This is all and yet the way

Marked by Him who loves us best

Secret of a happy day—

Secret of His promised rest.

Man is the Hour-glass of God!

And grain by grain his being flows

Out of the globe of surface shows

Into the globe below the soil!

Clear of the sunken sands of strife,
God turns below the body's bowl—

And so upturns Man's crystal soul
Brimmed with the golden grains of life!

—R. V. Heckscher.

A Saint.

"Salute the beloved Persis," said St. Paul

To the Church at Rome; and thee, saint of to-day,

We greet, thus meeting on life's common way.

No shining task is thine, observed of all;

Thou toiled screened within thy garden small.

Thy plot of ground, tended with faithful care—

Thy hearthstone white, thy children taught their prayer—

Happier thy husband than the squire in hall.

Thy cap's a nimbus round thy honest head;

Eye upon work is as in worship bent;

Prayer thy grave face, thine arms in toil outspread;

That gathered fruit into the basket shed

An offering poured to God doth represent.

Much in the Lord, thou, too, hast labored.

—Walter Morison.

The Inner Self.

It is difficult to get a glimpse of a man's soul. So many individuals never purposely reveal their inner selves. They are delicate and sensitive to the scrutiny of other people. The sheath of the soul is always in evidence. How then can we watch for it? We never know another until we really glimpse the soul. Experience reveals this; the soul of some men is not revealed until its life and integrity is attacked, whether of itself or of another. Then when the man is aroused, when his sense of justice is violated, when his feeling of personal integrity is questioned, when his personal honor is attacked, watch for the appearance of his soul. Then the man himself is seen in form and reality, standing in defense of what is dear to him as his own heart.—Exchange.

Indians in the War.

The Rev. Thomas C. Moffett, a foremost authority on Indian affairs, has just made a report on Indians and the war in which he shows that Indians, in proportion to numbers, have made a record quite equaling white Americans. He adds that to numbers must be set down also character and conduct, in both of which the Indians have made good. He recalls some reasons why Indians might not be willing to fight the battles of whites, especially of English-speaking whites. Among these reasons is the withholding of citizenship, which by the way Mr. Moffett thinks may not longer be withheld, when after the war the splendid record of Indian troops is taken into account. Mr. Moffett says the record of Indians at home in subscribing for Liberty Bonds, and in giving to the Red Cross, must also be set down. It seems that sons of former Apache Chief Geronimo and former Chief Victoria, long enemies of the Government, gave liberally to the last Red Cross drive.

It seems that the same record of American Indians has been made by Canadian, with approximately 10,000 Indians from both countries now in the service "somewhere in France." Especially commended in Canada are the Iroquois and the Algonquins, long hereditary enemies but fighting side by side in France, the Mohawks and the Dakotas, and in the United States the Dakotas, the Chippewas, the Five Civilized Tribes of Oklahoma, and the Pimas and other Indians of the desert regions of the southwest. By far the larger numbers of men enlisting—many are not subject to the selective draft—come from the Government and Mission schools. Some have urged that there be separate Indian commands, but Indians themselves and most religious leaders among whites are gratified at the Government's course in putting them with whites. Every authority on the Indian is loud in praise of the contribution of men made in this war by the Indians.

No little child has ever come from God and stayed a brief while in some human home—to return again to the Father—without making glad that home and leaving behind some trace of heaven. A family had counted themselves poorer, without those quaint sayings, those cunning caresses, that soft touch, that sudden smile. This short visit was not an incident: it was a benediction. The child departs, the remembrance, the influence, the associations remain. If one should allow us to have Sarto's Annunciation for a month, we should thank him; when he resumed it for his home he would not take everything, for its loveliness of maid and angel is now ours forever. And if God recalls the child He lent, then let us thank Him for the loan and consider that what made that child the messenger of God—its purity, modesty, trustfulness, gladness—has passed into our soul.—Ian Maclaren.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in everyday life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

A PRAYER FOR THE Y. M. C. A.

By the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., Christ Church, Baltimore, Md.

Our Father, Who hast revealed Thyself in the person of Jesus Christ, our Elder Brother, we thank Thee for the gifts of body, mind and spirit. Thou dost continually enrich life for each of us and thereby dost give us the opportunity to enrich the lives of others. Help us to realize fully our gifts, to use them and to know what they signify. Give us the vision to see men and things in love and in the strength of Christian manhood. May we each day quit ourselves like men and uphold and constantly strive for purity of thought and action and those virtues of Christian living, which mark the perfect man and the upright. We would especially ask Thy blessing upon the Y. M. C. A., which by its magnificent work, through its consecrated workers and its ever increasing membership is striving to make men everywhere better in body, mind and spirit with Jesus Christ as the example of the true nobility of living. May this institution along with all other Christian work go forward to nobler tasks and broader visions and more liberal thought. May its power for good be generously felt in all places and at all times to strengthen and enspire men in their common round of daily duties and render life more intimate and happier for those away from their own hearth fire and roof tree. Bless the noble work it is doing across the seas among the soldiers, sailors, aviators and marines. May it impress men with the lesson of physical health and robust nature and the body as the temple of the living God. Grant that by reason of a more splendid bodily vigor men may grow stronger spiritually and be ready, as athletes of God, to run the race that is set before them, and at the close win the prize of glory which Thou hast for those who above all else unfeignedly love Thee. We ask this in Jesus' name. Amen.

A MATTER FOR LAY CONSIDERATION.

It is always a hopeful indication when laymen of standing and influence take a large part in the discussion of ecclesiastical matters. The laity constitute nearly one hundred and ninety-nine-two hundredths of the Church. When all has been said in deference to the special training and proper spiritual leadership of the clergy it is still plain that the Church has need to know the sound opinions and judgments of her thoughtful laymen, lest her guidance be left too exclusively in the hands of a single class. Particularly is this true in times like these, when new issues are pressing to the fore and difficult problems are likely to arise for solution—times that are going to demand of the Church new departures, a broader outlook and greater practical efficiency. The world after the war will be a different world, as we hope and believe, not only in Germany and Russia and France, but here in America also, else much that we are fighting and sacrificing for will have gone to naught. It must be a world of higher ideals, larger opportunities and clearer visions of duty. We need not call it socialism, but there will be large changes in the old social and economic order as there ought to be. We will not call it altruism, but society will make greater demands upon the individual and the class for unselfish and intelligent service. But all this will need wise, spiritual, godly inspiration and direction. The Church after the war—will she be ready for her task? Will she be strong enough, united enough, clear-sighted enough, to fulfil her whole duty and meet the tremendous spiritual and, as we say, practical opportunities that will rise before her? It is a matter worthy of real solicitude and that demands earnest consideration by the laity no less than by the Bishops and clergy, lest that day come upon us unawares.

Especially does the fundamental problem of Church unity at this moment challenge their attention and call for their voice in its determination. The clergy are far too apt to see it through the haze of old theological controversies or even less clearly through the astigmatic medium of fixed preconceptions. It is a question that needs to be reconsidered in the open, with a clear perspective and unbiased vision; to be thought through with an eye to the new conditions that confront the Christian Church in a new age of human advancement and human relationships. In this era of rational democracy sectarianism, under whatever venerable guise, is as much out of date as feudalism. It is strangling the energies of God's Kingdom almost as the system of caste has strangled the great nations of the East, and with hardly more reason. Whatever may be said for the spiritual unity of the Church, and, of course, there is such unity of spiritual life, the world does not see it nor has it accomplished the task which Christ assigned to His believing people in a visible and workable and world-convincing unity.

The subject bristles with difficulties, of course, but many of them are theoretical. At all events it is one that must be grappled with and one that is demanding the best thought of the Church to-day. It calls for wide discussion by thinking men of practical bent of mind. For this reason we will particularly welcome communications bearing on this vital question and trust that many of our laymen especially will follow the example of our correspondent, Dr. Dillard, and speak their mind in this matter, that the true thought of the Church may find expression and be crystallized against the approaching time of action.

CLERGY IN WAR SERVICE.

From the Church War Commission we have a list of the clergy of the Church who are engaged in war service as chaplains or otherwise. Its publication is begun in this issue and will be continued until completed. It contains more than four hundred names and addresses, and is one that may be read with feelings of gratification and pride. It represents over eight per cent of the active clerical force of the Church, and even so is by no means a full exhibit. New names are being added daily from among the many who are eager to be admitted into this goodly company, there being a long waiting list of those whose services have been offered and who are hoping for permission to go. Moreover, there are a large number of clergymen living within reach of camps and other bases who are freely giving a goodly portion of their time to the service of the soldiers in one form or another, and others who are serving as special preachers when called upon or in other ways, whose names are not recorded but the aggregate of whose services is very considerable.

Already several chaplains and others have given their lives in fact to the cause, as others are showing their willingness to do if it be God's will for them. The number of those making the supreme sacrifice will grow sadly longer as the men to whom they minister find their way in great numbers to the fighting front. It is no light task that these our brethren have taken up, and among the petitions which we make before the Throne of Grace their needs and dangers should have particular and loving remembrance. It is so that our sympathy and solicitude will most surely help and uphold them and we at home, in our little way, have our share in the laurels, military and spiritual, which they will win.

SUNDAY PROBLEM OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. Editor: The report of the "War Camp Community Service" indorsing the community service held in Charleston, S. C., has called forth many inquiries for an account of the nature of the service provided and for a statement of the social features, so that a brief review of the origin and character of the community service is here given.

On March 20, Chaplain William Reese Scott, a Church clergyman, arrived in Charleston with the Seventeenth United States Infantry, where a portion of that organization had been detailed for guard duty, and the next day the chaplain suggested to the Bishop and the Clericus a plan for the Sunday work among the enlisted men of the army and navy in Charleston. The plan met with the heartiest approval and indorsement of all concerned, and Bishop Guerry and the Church Club of Charleston assumed the financial responsibility for the project, and the direction and control of the undertaking was placed in the hands of Chaplain Scott, assisted by an able committee of the Church Clergy, the Rev. S. Cary Beckwith being named as Chairman. Large committees, consisting of prominent citizens of Charleston, were selected to serve as ushers and helpers, and other committees of experienced women were appointed to take charge of the social features and the refreshments to be served after the services.

The entire plan was in actual operation the following Sunday, Artillery Hall, the largest auditorium in Charleston, being secured for the services, and the large basement below the ball-room being used during the cooler weather for the social entertainment, and the large lawn, lit by electricity, being used in the warmer season. The commander of the army department and the commandant of the Charleston Navy Yard, and the Clergy of Charleston were present, while the music was rendered by the united choirs of the city, accompanied by the Seventeenth Infantry band. The service was a wonderful success, as was also the social feature, and has continued so until the present with equal success, many thousands being present, and a wonderful influence for good has resulted. The Community Service has been indorsed by the Fosdick Commission, by the army and navy authorities and by the people of Charleston; and has been followed in many other church organizations and communities with equal success.

The religious services are characterized by three features, namely, a military or navy band is always present; six hymns under the chaplain's leadership, and always printed on a special leaflet, provide the sacred singing, accompanied by a large choir, a pianist and the band; prominent speakers with a message, brief, clear and to the point are selected for the religious talk and prominent laymen for a condensed resume of some patriotic subject are the four-minute speakers. Before and after the services the band renders appropriate selections; the prayers suitable for time and occasion, are said from memory, the Apostles' Creed and the Benedictions are used; the service closes with the Star Spangled Banner. The time allotted for service is one hour, and then all adjourn to enjoy the social reception, which, under the careful management of the trained committees and the able social workers, has developed a splendid spirit of co-operation and mutual admiration between the army and navy and marines and industrial workers and the entire community of Charleston.

Chaplain Scott's experience and success with similar services at Fort Monroe and in the Hawaiian Islands has been of the greatest benefit in enabling a closer relationship to develop between the men in uniform and the civilians of the city of Charleston, and has enabled the Churchmen of that city to perform a war-time duty which has been of the greatest spiritual benefit to all concerned.

THE PAPACY AND THE NEW DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE.

Mr. Editor:

The President, in his speech at Washington's tomb on the Fourth of July, indicated a series of tasks that are laid upon this country in making good her new Declaration of Independence for all the peoples of the world. The first task he names is this:

"The destruction of every arbitrary power anywhere that can separately, secretly and of its single choice, disturb the peace of the world; or if it cannot be presently destroyed, at the least its reduction to virtual impotence."

Mr. Wilson was speaking of the Hohenzollern, Hapsburg autocracies; but there is an arbitrary power in both the political and the ecclesiastical world which it is equally necessary should be destroyed or rendered virtually impotent if our and our allies' purposes of freedom for all the world are to be realized; if our prayers and efforts for Church Unity are to avail. It is the Papacy.

All history bears witness to the Papacy's identification with this description of the President's. It is arbitrary beyond the wildest dreams of even the Kaiser, for its claims to divine right are more ancient and sweeping than his (and equally without sound basis). It has again and again, separately, secretly and of its single choice disturbed the peace of the world, and because of this identity of nature it stands today identified in interest with the Central Powers of Europe, against America and her allies, by every mark short of a formal alliance.

1. The Pope has uttered no word of condemnation of Germany's violation of her treaties, atrocities in Belgium and France, partnership in the Turkish massacres, under-sea piracy, nor even of her insults to Cardinal Mercier and murder and ravishment of priests and nuns in the occupied territories, except that in general terms, equally applicable to our allies, he has deplored the horrors of war.

2. The Papacy has identified itself with the Sinn Fein sedition in Ireland. In a recent issue of the Catholic Review, the official organ of Cardinal Gibbons, under date of June 1, there occurs the following:

"The Irish have determined not to accept compulsory service for reasons which have been given and have organized themselves to resist the measure. A part of this organization has been that the Catholic hierarchy, at a meeting at Maynooth under the presidency of Cardinal Logue (the highest Papal representative in Ireland) have given their approval to the policy of opposition and in addition have organized the Irish people in their resistance." (Black type mine.)

And not only in Ireland. In the United States the Sinn Fein conspiracy has found its largest financial aid and encouragement. Irish-Americans were found last week refusing to march in parades of naturalized citizens if the British flag were carried before them—our ally's flag! Before we entered the war, in the presidential election of 1916, the Papal power was exerted in every principal city, in co-operation if not in alliance with the German-American Alliance, to procure Mr. Wilson's defeat as a rebuke for his sympathy with the Allies.

In Australia, where the Papal Archbishop boasts that it was his organization that defeated conscription, and in Quebec, the only Roman Catholic province in Canada, and also the only one that resisted conscription, the same interference against our new Declaration of Independence is conspicuous.

We should understand that this interference of the Papacy in the conduct of the war in no small degree embarrasses our cause. If Sinn Fein succeeds in forcing Parliament to accord Home Rule to the whole of Ireland, the Protestant Six Counties in the north, enthusiastically loyal to the allied cause, will be immediately forced under the heel of the Roman Hierarchy, and England, our ally, will find herself menaced by an enemy at her very doors, separated by only a narrow strip of water. Bases for U-boats may be established on Ireland's coasts to harass and destroy our transports carrying our boys to France and in many ways a most valuable service will be rendered our enemies.

3. The papal peace notes and special prayers for peace have appeared at such times and in such form as in each instance to serve the cause of the German "peace offensive."

4. There is excellent authority for the statement that one of the principal causes of the disaster to the Italian army last fall was papal pro-Austrian propaganda among the Italian populations. Italy had disowned the temporal sovereignty of the Pope; Austria was the Pope's most loyal supporter and champion for the restoration of his temporal power.

I forbear to ask for more of your space for particularization. This arbitrary power of the Papacy has often, separately, secretly and of its single choice, through many centuries, disturbed the peace of the world—never more conspicuously than now. Our magazines and newspapers, generally, appear to be either subsidized, terrified, ignorant or indifferent. The same may be said of our politicians. An aggressive propaganda within the fold of the Protestant Episcopal Church has indoctrinated her people with the opinion that the first part of her name was something to be ashamed of and should be dropped. Protestantism, the one flag under which the modern world has ever found it possible to organize adequate resistance to this arbitrary power of the Papacy, has been condemned as a weak, negative thing, unworthy of virile American Churchmanship. Perhaps we are coming to see that our country's Protestantism against the arbitrary powers of Europe, who are seeking to assert a Catholic kultur throughout the world, offers a new parallel in the light of which we may see that we have no cause to be ashamed of the struggles and sacrifices that our Protestant fathers of the sixteenth century underwent in order to free the world from the Papal tyranny. So far from it that the torch has been handed on to us.

Our fathers added a petition to the Litany in those dreadful times—"From the Pope and all his detestable enormities, Good Lord deliver us." It is the language of a people in dire extremity and of the sixteenth century, not of the twentieth. We are able to respect and admire the personal qualities and piety of the individual Bishop of Rome. But, from the Papacy as an institution, infinitely harmful to the whole Catholic Church, in Italy, Austria, France, Germany and Ireland, as well as in America, based upon false decretals and upon violence and intrigue, an insuperable obstacle to Church Unity, must we not pray that, out of this world struggle against autocracy in Germany and Austria, we may find deliverance also from the Papacy?

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

IV. Support of Clergy. What Should Be the Proportion of Gifts For That Purpose?

When it is boldly asserted that the "remuneration of our mission Clergy is far from satisfactory," that there are "very many instances of men in the ministry who are in grave distress because no adequate opening for pastoral work comes to them to which a living wage is attached," and that "there are constant cries from the mission field" for Clergy who "will do hard work with very little pay"—when assertions like these are frequently made, indicating that the salaries of our Clergy in many cases are inadequate, it becomes quite pertinent to ask another question: "What proportion of the gifts of our people should go for the support of the Clergy? If in some localities, ten per cent of the church buildings that have been erected are seldom used, the question arises: "Ought we not to provide better for the Clergy who should minister in vacant places?"

An examination of the reports as given in journals of Dioceses and missionary districts, will show not only that there are large numbers of feeble parishes and missions, but also that there is a hard struggle in some instances to keep the church open and maintain church services. In many places where there are less than one hundred communicants, from sixty to eighty per cent of all money given for church purposes goes to pay the pastor's salary. Such is the necessity. The small salary of the clergyman must be raised, or else the church will be closed. This is what may be seen in many small towns and in country places both in the East and in the West.

Turn now to reports from strong parishes with three to five hundred communicants or more. What is true in one parish may not be true in another. But in many strong parishes in the larger cities, not one-fourth their income is needed to pay a rector and his assistants. In most cases these parishes give for the support of missions, both in their own city and elsewhere. But a closer examination of reports reveals also this fact. Take all that is given for support of Clergy, their own rector and others, for the support of missionaries either at home or abroad; include in that amount what is given toward the support of their Bishop, and other objects for benefit of Clergy, put all these objects together, and it will be found that many strong parishes do not use more than forty or fifty per cent of their regular income for support of Clergy in any form. In other words, it may be seen that many large and strong parishes are giving a much smaller percentage of their income toward support of Clergy than is given in many small and weak parishes and in mission stations.

Where, then, in these strong city parishes does the money go? We answer: In cost of maintenance, in cost of music, in insurance, in cost of repairs, in improvement of buildings, in payment of debts. Two, three and four times as much money goes for these purposes as for clergymen's salaries. One city parish is in competition with another city parish. Which can have the most attractive service? Which will give the best music? Here is the call for the expenditure of money. The parish spends a large share of its income in these ways upon itself. A smaller percentage goes to support of Clergy.

Take now for comparison the missionary district of Arizona. In the year 1880 Bishop Dunlop was consecrated and Arizona became a part of his field of labor. In Arizona we had then no clergyman at work anywhere, no church buildings and probably no church property of any kind. There might have been a hundred scattered communicants. To-day there are no less than twenty-six hundred communicants, seventeen church buildings, eleven rectories and two hospitals.

As the erection of all these buildings has been borne, in part at least, by people in Arizona, it might be thought that a smaller proportion of money would be given for support of Clergy. Not so. Reports show in many places fifty, sixty and even eighty per cent of all receipts go for support of Clergy.

Take now, for comparison, another State. When Oklahoma was opened to white settlement twenty-nine years ago, one small building had been secured for church purposes. Today Oklahoma has forty-one church buildings, twenty-one rectories, besides a hospital and a church hall. The burden upon small and weak congregations has been very heavy, yet the percentage of offerings for support of Clergy and for domestic and foreign Missions is larger than in many strong parishes elsewhere, in some cases having endowments and pew rents to rely upon. Often these give less than ten per cent of their income for missions, while weak parishes and mission stations give as large a percentage for this object. Why is it so? Out on the western prairies and in the Rocky Mountain region are scattered Church families and baptized children, where there are no prayer book services held. For church service or Sunday-school, if they go at all, they must go fifty miles or more.

It is a great contrast, with the privileges in strong parishes in our large cities.

What can be done to remedy the situation? There are some who will think and say: "If in a large parish not so much is needed for the Clergy of the parish, then a much larger proportion should go to support of Clergy elsewhere."

Something is wrong somewhere. It is not a lack of ability of our people to give, it is not an unwillingness to give, but it is the fault of a system through which parishes spend lavishly and luxuriously for themselves while others suffer. It is the system that needs to be corrected.

A TRIBUTE, TO ONE AND TO MANY.

Bishop Randolph was truly one of the Princes of the Church. A scholar, a thinker, an orator—all these in high degree—he was above all the devout disciple, the saintly Father-in-God; and, what abides in the memory of his friends and is worthy to abide—the perfect Christian gentleman. He was a great preacher, and had his office allowed him more leisure, he would have been a distinguished writer, if one may judge from his one volume, a masterly work on Reason, Faith and Authority. He was fourth in order of seniority in the House of Bishops.

I am moved to add a word on behalf of the great multitude fallen asleep in faith after having served God in their generation: loyal men and women bearing their burdens, fighting the fight, "seeing it through"—without whom the leadership of the leaders would amount to nothing. I am thinking of the long list known in its entirety to God alone, who in the kingdom and patience of Jesus Christ endured through their day and whose works do follow them. And the more do I think of such, as my thought goes out to the lengthening list of those who, not in ripe old age, but in the dawn or prime of manhood, have this past year finished their earthly course: I think of what we as a Christian people owe them, officers many, but privates how many more! We who remain must not be unworthy of such sacrifice. In our places and tasks we may at least in spirit make some corresponding sacrifice, which is our reasonable service.—Bishop W. F. Faber, in Convention Address.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY.

(By Harmon D. Jones, Camp Secretary, Brotherhood of St. Andrew.)

This new National Army, as we view it from this side, and as we read of its achievements thus far on the other side, certainly displays a solicitude for the morals and spiritual welfare of the men that is a little short of amazing. In fact, it is but one of many indications that our national leaders fully realize the ultimate issues of this war are not material, but that after the great conflict there will remain the problem of building up a new order of things, a new earth. With this wise foresight, the fullest possible co-operation and encouragement are being given to all efforts to prepare the men to achieve the higher aims of their natures. From the closest observation in our vast cantonments there is revealed a close unifying spirit between chaplains of various denominations, the Y. M. C. A. religious workers and all other religious agencies. The spirit which seems to prevail in France is rapidly spreading in this country, and in so far as war work is concerned there seems to be a gradual merging of many denominations, the great realities of life in the army are so big—so grand—that the men seem to be thoroughly oblivious to the petty differences which have made so many unhappy divisions. To an observing and interested layman it seems most significant. There was a statement typical of this spirit issued by the commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in France—General John J. Pershing:

"Hardship will be your lot, but trust in God will give you comfort.

"Temptation will befall you, but the teachings of our Saviour will give you strength.

"Let your valor as a soldier and your conduct as a man be inspiration to your comrades and honor to your country."

"Behold, I make all things new." The reality of which is surely approaching, includes the new heaven, the new idea of God-Worship—"In spirit and in truth"—a new earth wherein dwell eth righteousness, a new civilization with a spiritual vision—a Christocracy—and a new people who have seen the vision of the Living God. Does it not seem that this will be the ultimate outcome of our present conflict?

NEGRO EDUCATION A NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

At the recent meeting of the Department of Superintendence of the National Education Association, Dr. J. H. Dillard, the Southern president of the Slater and Jeane Boards, presented a plan for national assistance to colored public schools which was heartily endorsed by that body.

National aid to negro public school education, Dr. Dillard declared, rests on justice to the negro, to whom the nation which enslaved and then freed him owes an education which will fit him for intelligent and efficient living under the conditions of freedom. It rests also on justice to the South, which "should not have been expected to bear the whole burden of the negroes' public education." "For the presence of the negro, and his use as a slave, were due, not to the South alone, but to the whole country," which "as a whole, consented and abetted."

The South has done much, "yes, very much, as the great reduction in illiteracy well shows." Yet, "it is still true that in most parts of the South the terms of negro schools are too short, and the pay and consequent fitness of the teachers too low. Longer terms and better teachers are the two outstanding needs."

The plan calls for aid for negro public schools in fifteen States, from Delaware to Texas, with the possible addition of West Virginia and Missouri, all Federal funds being used to increase salaries, a step which would insure better teachers. The amount proposed is "for fifteen years one-third, for ten years one-fourth, for five years one-fifth, of the amount expended each preceding year for all purposes of negro education from public funds, in each county and city, and for each State institution of higher grade."

Accurate figures are not available; but the maximum yearly total contributed by the government would probably be about $2,000,000.00—certainly not over $3,000,000.00, "a small sum for the whole nation to pay in performing a high duty and achieving a widespread benefit": for "the prosperity, the safety and the health of the nation depend upon the spread of knowledge, intelligence, efficiency and enlightened purposes among all citizens of every race and calling."

With the backing of the National Education Association, and embodying both justice and patriotism, it is hoped that this plan will become a reality, to the benefit of the nation, and of both races concerned.

The Great Commission

Anniversaries of the Widely Loving.

J. C. E.

On April 12 the Widely Loving Society in Osaka, Japan, celebrated in its Chapel of the Holy Redeemer the twenty-eighth anniversary of its foundation and the twenty-fifth of the death of its founder, Mr. Katsunosuke Kobashi. After his death his brother, Mr. Jitsimosuke Kobashi, succeeded to the headship, and this was, therefore, also the occasion of his completion of a quarter century of service. Miss Bull gives the following account in the monthly record of the society:

"Underneath the portrait of the founder, which hangs on the wall of the chapel opposite that of our revered Bishop Williams, was placed the jar containing the heart of the devoted elder brother, a precious relic retained by his request, to be a reminder of the spirit with which the work of the society should be carried on.

"The chapel was filled to its utmost capacity with the one hundred and fifty children and the many guests. There were congratulatory speeches from representatives of the governor and the mayor, from the graduates of the institution and other old friends. Mr. Kobashi gave an interesting resume of the history of the Widely Loving Society. The children sang well two appropriate songs, for which they had been trained by Miss Tsuru Takemoto, a graduate of the institute and of St. Agnes' School. Bishop Foss, of the Diocese of Osaka, our kind and generous friend, before pronouncing the blessing at the close, made a happy little speech in which he referred to Bishop Williams, pointing to his venerable portrait, and to others who had helped the society from its anxious beginnings; especially lauding the Kobashi (Little Bridge), which has been the principal passage from anxiety over to happiness.

"Another happy celebration during the month of April was that of the twentieth anniversary of the entrance of Mrs. Otake into our work. By the death of her husband, one of our first deacons, she had been left a widow with two little sons, the youngest only two years old. During the twenty years of her devoted service, she has not only brought up her own children to a fine, useful manhood (the elder is the esteemed catechist of the Nikko Church), but a large family of boys and girls rise up to call this mother blessed."

Prayer For Unity.

Christians are beginning to realize that only a Christianity visibly united can convert the world to Christ, and that such a visible unity can be attained only through prayer which shall put the wills of the members of the Church Militant in harmony with the will of Christ its head.

The Octave January 18-25 (January 5-12 in the Eastern calendar) of prayer for the visible reunion of the Church which is the body of Christ, was observed in 1918 in every part of the world and by Christians of every communion; but a still more general observance is needed, and a more complete surrender of our hearts and minds and wills to the will of God.

The Commission of the American Episcopal Church on the World Conference on Faith and Order, therefore, again requests Christendom to observe the same Octave in the year 1919 for the same purpose. This notice is sent out early to reach the distant parts of the world. But many of us who will receive this request at once may well spend six months in prayer that through united intercession Christians may have no will except the will of the one Lord.

By order of the Commission,
ROBERT H. GARDINER.

Secretary.

July 10, 1918.

Oklahoma: Twenty-five years ago the Rev. Francis Key Brooke was consecrated Missionary Bishop of Oklahoma. In the quarter-century which has passed he has seen the sparsely-settled territory grow into a State with a population of nearly two million. Beginning scarce twenty-eight years ago, as a white man's community, the State stands to-day about the twentieth in size strong, prosperous (but only so after years of poverty), a Commonwealth of size and character that has done in twenty-five years what its neighbors have done in sixty years. Seven years ago the State was divided into two missionary districts, Bishop Brooke remaining in charge of the western half of the State and Bishop Thurston taking the eastern part. The story of those twenty-five years is one which the Church has had to learn in large measure from others, because the Bishop is most reluctant to speak about himself or his own work. That the work has been faithfully done, all know; that much has been accomplished anyone can see; that more has not been done is due simply to the fact that for one reason or another sufficient men and means have not been put at Bishop Brooke's disposal. The changes which he has witnessed represent the growth of prairies into cities and the replacing of tens by thousands, and the story of the Church in Oklahoma is one which will never lose its interest.

The Orient Wants Western Education: The Orient now wants, more than anything else in the world, better educational facilities. Ask a citizen of any Oriental country what three things he most desires for his people. Two of the answers may vary according to the local conditions, but one is uniformly the same from Sapporo to Hyderabad; better schools. Not all schools are so favorably situated as St. John's in Shanghai. There are hundreds of millions of people in Asia whose entire family income is not equal to the $220 Mexican (approximately $150 American currency) which St.

John's is able to charge for annual tuition. It is not the aim of every school to become self-supporting. The glory of the Christian ideal has always been that its primary care is for the poor and unfortunate. But every year the mission schools are able to shift their work more from the purely charity basis toward one of self-respecting independence. Western education is now so highly prized that pupils and parents alike are willing to make superlative sacrifices to acquire it.—From "The Missionary Schoolmaster," by Tyler Dennett, in March "Asia."

It surely says volumes for the spirit in which these men are fighting to liberate an oppressed and downtrodden country that up to November 1, 1917, three thousand seven hundred and seventeen soldiers in the Eastern army had sought and received the rite of confirmation, from the Bishop of the Jerusalem and the East Mission. No ceremony for the bestowal of knight-hood on the field in the days of the first Crusade could have been more thrilling than some of these confirmations held in the open air, just back of the line, and within the constant sound of the guns, the men coming up from the trenches to receive the rite, and returning immediately to their posts of danger. To men like these the cross on their national banner can be no empty symbol.—Ex.

Church Intelligence

Conference of Church War Workers of the Southeastern Department.

Rev. G. S. Whitney.

What was probably the first gathering of the representatives of this Church in the training camps of this country, was held on July 9 and 10 in Columbia, S. C., all sessions taking place in Satterlee Hall, the parish house of Trinity Church, the Rev. K. G. Finlay, rector. There were twenty-eight Clergy and Laity in attendance, divided as follows: One army chaplain, eight civilian chaplains, eight rectors of parishes adjacent to camps, one clerical member of the Church War Commission, and ten members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew engaged in training camp work.

The Rev. Dr. W. H. Milton, rector of St. James, Wilmington, N. C., and a member of the Church War Commission, was some time ago appointed to represent the Commission in the inspection of our work in five camps situated in the Carolinas and Georgia and to address the soldiers in the Y. M. C. A. huts wherever arrangements could be made. He has, in the past five weeks, visited Camps Greene, Wadsworth, Sevier, Jackson and Hancock, and has spoken five or six nights a week. He has addressed varying numbers of the men, who almost universally showed excellent attention and appreciation of his strong, clear presentation of the gospel message from the Church's point of view. At the close of his tour, he felt that there was great need of a conference of our chaplains, rectors and Brotherhood workers in the field, and at the suggestion of the Rev. E. A. Penick he called the meeting at Columbia.

The conference was opened by a celebration of the Holy Communion at 10 o'clock, Dr. Milton officiating, following which an organization was effected by the election of Dr. Milton as chairman and the Rev. E. A. Penick, secretary. A Committee on Findings and Resolutions was appointed, consisting of the chairman, ex-officio, the Rev. Messrs. Penick, Whitney and Blackford and Mr. Gordon M. Reese.

An elaborate program had been prepared, embracing every subject of interest to those engaged in camp work. Remarkable to state, the entire program was carefully covered without haste or neglect of any point and strictly according to the schedule, the conference adjourning at five o'clock on Wednesday. Each day at noon prayers for missions were offered, followed by a few moments of vigorous "setting up" exercises, led by Mr. Penick. The following includes most of subjects considered:

I. How to begin. Recognizing authorities; establishing headquarters; what equipment, etc.

II. Relationships. With military authorities; with Y. M. C. A.; with camp pastors and city parishes.

III. System. Records; transfers; reports; following up, etc.

IV. Publicity. Advertising services; "Y" bulletins; notices, etc.

V. Wearing a uniform. Is it advisable?

VI. Services. Holy Communion; where; how often; methods of communicating; other services; preaching; confirmation; Bible classes.

VII. Finances. Expenses; printing; automobile; contingent fund.

VIII. Hospital work.

IX. Miscellaneous problems.

On Tuesday evening the subject was the work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew in the camps. Mr. B. F. Finney, the General Secretary for the War Work, presided. Several stirring and illuminating addresses were made by Mr. Finney, by Mr. F. S. Tittsworth, the head of the Philadelphia office, and Mr. Gordon M. Reese, lately appointed Field Secretary for the South. Mr. Finney outlined the history of the war work of the Brotherhood and its relationships with the Y. M. C. A. He told of the conference with Mr. John Mott, and his earnest request that this Brotherhood of ours, which he had watched for thirty years would stand by the "Y" during the war, and promised unusual opportunities. Mr. Tittsworth stressed the necessity of searching out fit men for the ministry, who would come back from the war ready to begin their studies. Mr. Reese, who has spent some time with the Y. M. C. A. in France and with the Brotherhood at Quantico gave the conference a splendid vision of the opportunities and of the duty of the Church to put all her power behind her work for the men in the camps.

At the closing session the Committee on Resolutions presented their report in the shape of nine resolutions, several of which will be presented by Dr. Milton to our Church War Commission for their consideration and possible action. The first called for the appointment of the Rev. E. A. Penick and the Rev. Ambler Blackford to prepare a hand-book for the use of civilian chaplains and other camp workers, the same to be submitted before publication to the Committee on Resolutions and then to the War Commission. Other resolutions suggested the use of a card system by rectors of parishes adjacent to camps; the issuing of a proper form of commission for all workers in the field; the use of a form of monthly report by civilian chaplains; the residence of new chaplains in some well organized camp before entering on their own work and the provision of a regular and adequate contingent fund for chaplains and B. S. A. Secretaries. The last resolution recited the need of a room or chapel where the Holy Communion can be celebrated with dignity and in quiet, and asked the Commission to use every endeavor to secure such places either as a separate building or attached to the "Y" huts.

The Conference was largely an experience meeting of those who had been meeting new and difficult problems and solving them each in his own way. The interchange of ideas was most helpful and will result in at least a partial standardization of the methods, though each camp has a certain amount of individuality and the military regulations are not the same everywhere. But wherever the worker has approached his task with fitness and tact he has met with the cordial co-operation of the authorities.

On Wednesday the members of the Conference were entertained at a delightful luncheon at the Church of the Good Shepherd, and were further indebted to the kind hospitality of the church people of Columbia throughout their stay.

The following were in attendance: Rev. W. H. Milton, St. James, Wilmington, N. C.; Rev. K. G. Finlay, Trinity, Columbia; Rev. A. S. Thomas, Good Shepherd, Columbia; Rev. Frank A. Juhan, Christ Church, Greenville, S. C.; Rev. G. S. Whitney, St. Paul's, Augusta, Ga.; Rev. W. H. K. Pendleton, Advent, Spartanburg; Rev. Branwell Bennett, St. John's, Columbia; Rev. Joseph R. W. Walker, St. Timothy's, Columbia; the Rev. R. E. Gribben, U. S. A., with the Pioneer Division. The following civilian chaplains: Rev. G. I. Hiller, Camp Gordon; Rev. I. H. Noe, Fort McPherson; Rev. Cyril B. Harris, Camp Hancock; Rev. E. A. Penick, Camp Jackson; Rev. N. Matthews, Camp Sevier; Rev. Ambler Blackford, Paris Island; Rev. H. O. Nash, Camp Greene; Rev. R. N. MacCullum, Camp Wheeler. Also the following officers and Camp Secretaries of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew: B. F. Finney, F. S. Tittsworth, Gordon M. Reese, J. Halsey Mallory, J. N. Friereson, Horace R. Chase, Wheeler; William A. James, Sevier; Thomas S. Forbes, McClellan; W. F. Poole, Fort Oglethorpe; Bernard Suttler, Gordon.

The Cambridge Conference.

Mrs. D. D. Taber.

The Cambridge Conference of 1918 was brought to a close Friday evening, July 5, with an inspiring charge from Father Officer summing up the teaching of the past two weeks, and our responsibility to the work (Heb. 10:32): "After ye were illuminated, ye endured a great fight of afflictions." Those privileged to attend the Conference this year had been given wonderful illumination and brought to feel and know that the power to overcome the affliction was gained only through the Holy Spirit and our dependence on God and His Son Jesus Christ.

In spite of the many difficulties created by the war, three hundred men and women from thirty-seven States and missionary districts gathered, with the determination to gain all the inspiration and knowledge possible to help meet conditions at home, made critical by the present world situation. Coming as they did with a definite aim of service, their vision of the work stimulated the interest of the classes and produced a spirit of fellowship, which was the keynote of the Conference.

The three general heads of study were: Religious Education, Mission Study and Social Service, and it was wonderful to see the unifying effect of the Conference. We found missions the outcome of religious education, and social service another name for missions. Conferences were held during the afternoon to discuss church activities, and an hour each evening was devoted to addresses by visitors and missionaries on various interesting forms of church work at home and abroad. Two evenings were reserved for the music school and one for the pageant given by the Juniors, which beautifully portrayed the life of the Church.

It has been truly said that the heart of the Cambridge Conference is the deepening of one's spiritual life. We start the day with the Holy Eucharist, pausing for the noon-day intercessions, gathering again for the sunset service, where a message is always given which emphasizes our responsibility to our fellow-man, and when the work of the day is over we commend ourselves to God's keeping for the night in the beauty of Compline.

If we can keep in mind our motto, "Be ye doers of the word and not hearers only," the Cambridge Conference of 1918 will be a living force in the world.

Columbia, S. C.

The summer conferences are said to be suffering in attendance as colleges and seminaries have done. Numbers at them are barely a third of the normal, and registrations for August show not much increase over July. Chautauqua, Silver Bay and others have put forth strong programs, based on war service almost entirely, but numbers of men are reported to be smaller even than usual, and women are present almost wholly that they may become teachers. The training of young men for war, of women to be nurses, is the explanation given by those in charge of the summer meetings. Northfield reports prospects good for August, and Chautauqua says a Naval Service School has attracted as much attention as all other departments combined.

Inquiries among business and professional men who are officers in principal cities bring information that hardly one contemplates a vacation, save in cases of illness or extreme age. The answer is almost universal that boys going to France are not going on vacations, and that with Huns forty miles from Paris vacations are not to be thought of. These conditions explain the small attendance at the summer meetings. In England such meetings have been given up altogether since 1915. In that year attempts were made at Keswick and other places, but not repeated in 1916. Along with the change in summer conferences is that of service stations in place of forums—doing things and not just talking about them. The original Chautauqua reports feeling the change in most striking ways.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

Ordination of Colored Priests.

On Tuesday, July 2, at St. Philip's Church, Richmond, Rev. Robert A. Jackson and Rev. Lorenzo A. King, deacons, were ordained to the priesthood by Rt. Rev. Robert A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop of Virginia.

The sermon was preached by Rev. Emmet E. Miller, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Petersburg, and the candidates were presented by the Rev. J. F. Ribble, D. D., rector of St. Andrew's Church, Richmond. Other Clergy taking part in the service were the Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., the Rev. Messrs. J. J. Gravatt, D. D., W. E. Cox, F. E. Warren and G. M. Brydon, of Richmond; John H. Scott, of Essex County, Virginia, and William E. Gilliam, of St. Philip's Mission, Syracuse, N. Y. The Rev. Mr. Jackson will continue in charge as rector of St. Philip's Church, Richmond, where he has spent his diaconate, and the Rev. Mr. King will continue for the present as missionary in Hanover County.

The Rev. William Byrd Lee, Jr., who has been in France since January last as a Y. M. C. A. Secretary, has received a commission as chaplain from the War Department with the rank of first lieutenant. When heard from he was still uncertain where he would be ordered to report.

A patriotic service was held in Christ church, Middlesex County, on Sunday, July 7. A service flag bearing seven stars was unveiled, with appropriate music and a stirring sermon by the rector, Rev. R. S. Litsinger. The flag hangs by the national flag in the chancel.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Mr. Fortescue Whittle, a prominent Churchman of Petersburg, died in Roanoke, Va., on July 13, after a prolonged period of failing health. Mr. Whittle was the eldest son of the late Right Rev. Francis M. Whittle, Bishop of Virginia, and his likeness to his father was often remarked. He was for many years a member and the most efficient Secretary of the Board of Trustees of the Bishop Payne Divinity School, and was likewise a director of the Southern Churchman Company. He served for a long time as a lay reader and an active helper in parochial missionary work.

TENNESSEE.

Rt. Rev. Thos. F. Gallor, D. D., Bishop.

Editor Southern Churchman:—

In connection with our work among the mountaineers, at St. Raphael's Institute, Monterey, Tennessee, a rather regrettable thing continues to occur which we feel but justified in calling to the attention of the Church at large. Announcement has been made that those formerly in charge of the work here are no longer connected with the institute or its work, having resigned to accept work elsewhere, yet we continue to receive remittances and parcels evidently intended for the work which are so directed or endorsed that it is impossible for those now in charge to receive them without going through a great deal of red tape, which occasions delay.

For the information of those who did not receive or see the notice of the change of incumbents we desire that all parcels and remittances be sent and be made payable to the institute, care of the Rev. A. C. Killeffer, rector, Monterey, Tennessee.

Prentice A. Pugh, President.

ASHEVILLE.

Rt. Rev. J. M. Horner, D. D., Bishop.

Ordination: On the sixth Sunday after Trinity, July 7, at 11 A. M., in St. John's Church, Marion, N. C., the Rev. C. R. Cody was ordained to the priesthood by Bishop Horner. He was presented by the Rev. A. H. Stubbs, Secretary of Convention, who, with the Rev. B. S. Lassiter, united in imposition of hands. The sermon was by the Rev. B. S. Lassiter from the text 1 Cor. 15:31: "I die daily." Mr. Cody has been a student at the Alexandria Seminary for two years, and returns in September for the third year. He has also assisted the Rev. Dr. Warner at St. Albans. During last summer and also the present summer he has been assistant to the Rev. B. S. Lassiter at St. Mary's Mission near Morganton, who bears witness to his efficiency. Besides the usual duties he held last summer three missions, at St. Mary's, Good Shepherd and at Old Fort, assisted by Mr. Lachey, of Alexandria Seminary. Mr. Cody now has summer charge of St. George's and Canton, besides St. Mary's and Good Shepherd.

CUBA.

Rt. Rev. H. R. Hulse, D. D., Bishop.

Twelfth Annual Convocation.

The opening service of the Convocation was held in the Cathedral; the daily sessions were held in the assembly room of the Cathedral schools, in the Vedado, a suburb of Havana. In addition to the Bishop fifteen Clergy were present and six candidates for Holy Orders.

Only routine business was conducted during the sessions. All the Standing Committees were re-elected or re-appointed, the only changes being those caused by the necessity of filling vacancies caused by death or removal. The Bishop in his address dwelt largely on the responsibilities of the ministry and the need of faithfulness therein.

The following were elected:

Secretary, the Rev. H. B. Gibbons, rector of the Cathedral Schools; Assistant Secretary, the Rev. E. Planas; Treasurer, Mr. R. R. Ellis; Chancellor (term unexpired), Mr. Albert Wright; Registrar, Mr. E. G. Harris; Historiographer, the Ven. W. W. Steel.

The following were appointed by the Bishop:

Archdeacons: The Rev. W. W. Steel, Archdeacon of Havana; the Rev. Francisco Diaz Volero, Archdeacon of the Cuban work in Central and Western Cuba.

Council of Advice: The Rev. W. W. Steel, President; the Rev. Francisco Diaz Volero, the Rev. J. M. Lopez Guillen, Mr. W. L. Platt, Secretary, Mr. H. A. Himely, Mr. E. G. Harris.

Amongst the Clergy of the district is one priest who received his Orders from the Roman Church, the Rev. Pablo Nunoz, now in charge of Calvario Mission, Jesus del Monte, Havana. Two others have been received as candidates on probation, with license to officiate as lay readers, and to preach. Of these, one Sr. Juan Thomas, is stationed at Sagua la Grande, where, under the direction of the Rev. J. S. Wicks, an American priest, he ministers to two Cuban congregations. The other, Mr. Angel Ferro, a notable preacher in Spanish, his native tongue, is acting as lay reader at the Cathedral, and has been preaching a series of missions in various parts of the island.

With the exception of three Cubans and one American, all the Clergy of the Church in Cuba can officiate in both Spanish and English.

The Bishop reported nineteen Clergy and ten men who are preparing for Holy Orders.

Ordinations: On Sunday, June 23, just after the sessions of the Annual Convocation of the district of Cuba, Ricardo D. Barrios and Aniceto Granda were ordered to the diaconate by Bishop Hulse, in Holy Trinity Cathedral, Havana, Cuba.

The presenters were Archdeacon Diaz, for Mr. Barrios, and the Rev. E. Planas for Mr. Granda.

The sermon was delivered by the Rev. C. L. Wells, Ph. D., Professor of Ecclesiastical History in the University of the South.

The service was unusual in that it was said partly in English and partly in Spanish, the sermon being in the former language.

Mr. Barrios received his early education for the ministry in the Methodist Church and lived for some time in the United States. He speaks both languages with facility. He is a Cuban.

Mr. Granda is a colored man, who formerly lived in the eastern part of Cuba. He was educated in the Bishop Payne Divinity School in Petersburg, Va. He has been placed in charge of the work at Jovellanos, and Mr. Granda of that in Bolondron.

Summer School: The most notable thing in connection with the Convocation of the Church in Cuba this year was the arrangement for a Summer School. Two series of lectures were given by the Rev. C. L. Wells, Ph. D., Professor of History in the University of Sewanee, Tenn., one upon Apologetics and the other upon the Book of Common Prayer. Bishop Hulse also gave a course upon confirmation.

These were all delivered in English and translated into Spanish for the benefit of those members of the Convocation who do not understand English.

In view of the fact that there is no divinity school in Cuba for our candidates, and that most of those who might be able to go to the United States for their theological training do not understand English, these summer schools are of great value to such men.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

The Church Temperance Society, supported in largest measure by the Episcopal Church, announces a plan that is based on the assumption that a prohibition amendment to the constitution, even if the amendment be ratified, will be of small avail unless backed by public opinion. The society also acts on the theory that the place of attack with an educational propaganda is the poor district, where drinking may be heaviest. Accordingly, the society has opened in the Bowery, New York, a theatre with moving pictures, intended to educate men and women on the subject of temperance. Other theatres are projected for other cities, the aim being to make, through the churches, a public sentiment that will demand the ratification of the amendment, and then observance of the temperance law.

The Church of the Holy Communion, Twentieth Street and Sixth Avenue, has this notice on its Hours of Service card:

"All people—especially army and Red Cross nurses, aviators, soldiers, sailors, Y. W. C. A. and Y. M. C. A. workers—have a right to the free use of this Father's house.

"For baptisms, confirmation, the Holy Communion, marriage, burial, calls of the Clergy in sorrow and in sickness, personal interviews with a clergyman—all people, though they are strangers to this church, are ever and always welcome.

"Never any charges made for the use of this church in connection with marriage, burials, etc.

"Call at the parish house, No. 49 West Twentieth Street, or telephone any hour of the night or day to Chelsea 9768. No one is ever kept waiting.

"Henry Mottet, Rector."

War Sermons: France and England. Bishop McCormick at Trinity: Old Trinity Church, at the head of Wall Street, was filled Sunday morning, July 14, to hear the Rt. Rev. Dr. John N. McCormick, Bishop of the Episcopal Diocese of Western Michigan, tell of war conditions in France. Bishop McCormick has long been in charge of chaplains of certain grades on the French front, and representative of Episcopal efforts there. The story he told yesterday was of absorbing interest. For the most part it was a tribute to the French people in the war; a Bastille day sermon fresh from the scenes and the events of the nation most concerned in Bastille history. The Bishop began by explaining that he purposed to make his address a Bastille one.

Speaking of Premier Clemenceau, of France, the Bishop explained the age of the premier, almost eighty, and referring to the tri-color of France which hung from the pulpit he said that Clemenceau is the tri-color; is the tiger, the bull dog, the tenacious purpose in the form of a man which is holding France true to her principles in the greatest crisis that any nation was ever called upon to pass through. The Bishop quoted General Foch in the saying that his left had been defeated, his right thrown back, but that he was, therefore, to attack with his center. The saying describes the present attitude of not only the French people but all of the Allies.

"It is not audacity," he said, "that one witnesses at close range when on the western front, but trained strategy. A general of division complained one day, when given a piece of work to do, that it was difficult. General Foch replied that if it were not difficult he would not bother with it. This represents the feeling of all France, and it proves, when difficult problems are solved, that the difficult task of bringing victory will be accomplished.

"During the German attack in April I was just behind the British lines. Some British soldiers, as may be remembered, gave way and left a dangerous gap in the front. French troops to the number of four thousand were ordered forward; a number quite insignificant compared with the numbers opposed to them. As French went forward they met British retreating, and one officer asked why it was well for the French to go forward when the English retreated."

"After all," was the reply, "it is our France."

"This explains why the French are invincible. Everything they do is well done.

"France would be unwilling to have it known that she thought France alone in sacrifice. She does not think so. She realizes the splendid sacrifice of the other nations."

The Bishop said in conclusion that he wished to dispel any notion on this side that the praise of American troops from French and English officers was for mere political or other effect, and added his testimony, from first hands, that the American boys are more than making good, and are delighting Allied officers with their ready wit, their splendid training, their independence and their proof that they have been trained in the very latest military methods. He told of an example given by Americans proving this fact, witnessed by French and English officers. He told of the remarkable marksmanship of Americans. Such direct and telling aim Europe had been unaccustomed to. It is an American contribution, the Bishop believed.

"In the spirit of July 4 and of July 14 let us say with others that those whom God hath joined together, England, France, Italy, Belgium, America and the rest, let no Germans put asunder."

Dr. J. Stuart Holden at St. James: "Beyond the red glare of the French and Albanian battle fronts of the moment there is the dawn of a new day," said the Rev. Dr. J. Stuart Holden, of London, in St. James Church, Madison Avenue and Seventy-first Street, yesterday morning. "This dawn is to usher in the moment when militarism is discredited, and gone forever. This is the certain feeling in England." The famous evangelical leader and Bible expositor said these and similar things to numbers which filled St. James in every seat. At St. Paul's Chapel, Columbia University, yesterday afternoon, chairs had to be brought in, so great was the crowd. His St. James text was the one about all things working together for good, and describing conditions in England he made these points:

All allied nations, England in particular, are witnessing the old selfishness give place to sacrifice.

The people are clinging to essentials, and throwing away things not worth while. This is especially true of England's privileged classes, the hitherto undemocratic elements.

There is a deepening sense of the sacredness of the national task and trust. We realize, as we never realized before, our responsibility to other nations, and to people within our own borders.

Old hatreds lasting a century and a half, and obtaining in England and America are giving place to mutual confidence, and loyal and fraternal allegiance to each other and to really great aims.

Misunderstandings are being destroyed, and there is such spirit of brotherhood as the world never knew or heard before.

The preacher explained that churches of England, Established and Free, are just now engaged in helping people to keep the old faith, and to convert individual experiences growing out of the war, its sufferings and sorrows, into positive Christian character. The people of England, he said, have been through a fire of tribulation. They are emerging braver and better. He believed that such experiences will come to Americans, and that American churches, American public spirit will gain as England's have done.

Dr. Holden will preach in St. James Church and at Columbia University again on the last Sunday in this month, and on the first three Sundays in August he will be the special preacher at Grace Church, Broadway and Tenth Street.

DALLAS.

Rt. Rev. A. C. Garrett, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. H. T. Moore, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Death of the Rev. Edwin Wickens.

The Rev. Edwin Wickens, for thirty-two years a priest of the Diocese of Dallas, passed away at All Saints' Hospital, Fort Worth, Texas, of which for nearly five years he had been the titular chaplain, on the evening of July 4, at the age of seventy-nine. After a celebration of the Holy Eucharist in St. Andrew's Church on Saturday morning, the 6th, by Bishop Moore, assisted by the Fort Worth Clergy, the body lay in state with vested Clergy of the Diocese standing as guards of honor, until 11 o'clock, when the burial service was said by Bishops Garrett and Moore, assisted by the Rev. Messrs. E. H. Eckel and F. T. Datson. Interment was made in Mount Olivet Cemetery, Fort Worth, six of the Dallas Clergy acting as pall-bearers.

Mr. Wickens was the second child of Edwin and Jane Wickens, of Walworth, Surrey, England, where he was born June 30, 1839. After serving for a time as a missionary of the Church of England in South Africa, Mr. Wickens came to America, and was ordained deacon by Bishop Quintard, of Tennessee, in 1870, and priest in 1875 by Bishop Gregg, of Texas, whose general missionary he was for several years. He was pre-eminently a pioneer missionary and builder of churches, and his name is associated with Denison, Sherman, Cuero, Groesbeck, Rockdale, Fort Worth, Decatur, Weatherford, Round Rock, Taylor, Buffalo, Pennington, Georgetown, and many other Texas towns and villages, in several of which he held the first services of the Episcopal Church, in some of which he built churches, and in a few of which he served for years at a time as missionary-in-charge. He was the founder of the Parish of the Incarnation, Dallas, and its minister for eleven years, from 1886 until it became a parish, whereupon he started All Saints' Mission, Dallas, and served it for thirteen years. For some years he was president of the Standing Committee, and he also represented the Diocese in the General Convention. He had lived in Fort Worth since November, 1912. He is survived by an unmarried sister at Hullborough, England, and an invalid daughter in Austin, Texas.

NEW MEXICO.

Rt. Rev. F. B. Howden, D. D., Bishop.

The Bishop visited the mission at Farmington on Sunday, June 30th. This church has been vacant for some time, since the departure of the former missionary, Rev. Thomas B. McClement. The Bishop has now arranged to have the work there taken by Rev. William B. Magnan, who comes from Ouray, Colorado. As he is already alive to the conditions of this western region, it is hoped that he may have a large and successful work.

HARRISBURG.

Rt. Rev. J. H. Darlington, D. D., Bishop.

A service of blessing of the flags of our allies, Belgium, France, Italy and Great Britain, was held in St. John's, Lancaster, on the evening of the sixth Sunday after Trinity. The service began with the Battle Hymn of the Republic, after which the flags were separately presented to the rector, Rev. George I. Browne, who said appropriate prayers. After each flag was presented one verse of its national anthem was sung. The sermon was on "The World Task of America and Her Allies."

The British flag was presented to St. John's Church by the British and SHIPS AND PROHIBITION.

The following is a pretty conclusive answer to Mr. Hurley's statement before the Senate committee considering nation-wide prohibition:

June 22, 1918.

Mr. Edward N. Hurley, Chairman, U. S. Shipping Board, Philadelphia, Pa.:

We have shipbuilding plants in Detroit, Ecorse and Ashtabula and know positively that the morale and efficiency of our men has been improved by change from so-called wet to dry conditions. At conference today of our executive officers, general managers and superintendents of various plants, serious objections were raised by all present to modification in any way of prohibitory laws now in effect in this State. If any statutory permission is given for the sale of beer and light wines in neighborhoods of our yards it would positively impede the program for delivery of ships we have promised to the Shipping Board. Are confident large majority of our employees would concur in this expression of opinion.

Prohibition has had such signal success in benefitting ship construction in Michigan that similar legislation is absolutely required in our opinion to enable the Shipping Board to carry out its war program for output. We are firmly in favor of the Jones amendment to the food emergency bill.

GREAT LAKES ENGINEERING WORKS,

JOHN R. RUSSELL, President.

It will be remembered that Mr. Hurley said that prohibition would be too great an experiment to try at this time.

THE SOURCE OF RESOURCEFULNESS.

One of the outstanding characteristics of Americans is their resourcefulness.

We do not all realize, however, the great debt that we owe to our Supreme Court for developing this virile and useful attribute.

That august body of nine eminent citizens has been trying for about a hundred years to hold back the American people.

By the adverse decisions to progressive legislation thereby necessitating accomplishing the same purpose in a different way or by another method it has finally developed the thinking powers of our citizens along such lines that this has become a great national characteristic.

The latest instance of getting around the Supreme Court is in the matter of child labor legislation.

The court acted as it usually does with new and progressive legislation and pronounced the Keating-Owens child labor law unconstitutional.

That law sought to put a stop to making children work by forbidding the shipment of goods which children had helped to manufacture from one State to another.

Blocked by the decision of the court in this effort, social workers and those interested in child welfare have again rallied to the attack, and are now favoring a bill introduced by Senator Kenyon, which prohibits sending matter through the United States mails by firms or corporations who use the labor of children.

It remains to be seen whether this law will wend its way successfully through the maze of court decisions, but if it does not we can rest assured that sooner or later such a law will be made that will effectually do so for the American people have made up their mind that the use in factories of children who should be in schools must stop, and eventually they will break by the Supreme Court and accomplish this end, just as finally legislation was enacted to secure revenue from large incomes, although that, too, was held up for some time.

LOOKING TO THE FUTURE.

The statement of Bishop Lawrence that our seminaries are "gloriously empty" is no idle expression. It is indeed a glorious fact that so many of our young Churchmen and older Clergy too are with the boys in France. It is a very fortunate as well as "glorious" thing.

We venture to predict that the Church that has the largest percentage of its Clergy participating in this mighty struggle for righteousness is the one that will wield the greatest power for good when the conflict is over and the victory won, because it will be the one that will have the closest touch with the great new attitude towards religion, and almost everything else that is now being borne.

It augurs well for the future life of our Church that we are represented at the front by such men as Bishops Brent, Israel, McCormick and Francis, who are helping to mould the religious thought of our young men, and at the same time are being moulded by those young men to their viewpoint, so that their influence in our Church councils will be of incalculable value when "the Sammies come marching home"

INTELLIGENT HELP FOR CRIPPLES.

This bulletin has recently been issued by the Red Cross News Department, and speaks for itself:

The following statement has just been issued by Douglas C. McMurtrie, director of the Red Cross Institute for Crippled and Disabled Men:

We must count on the return from the front of thousands of crippled soldiers. We must plan to give them the best possible chance for the future.

The government will provide the best of surgical care and special training for self-support. But whether this really puts the disabled man back on his feet in the community depends on whether the attitude of the public operates as a help or hindrance.

The American Red Cross desires to enlist the assistance of the Clergy of the United States—in their joint roles of personal advisers and leaders of community opinion—in promoting sound doctrine on these four points:

1. To convince the public that the cripple is not helpless but capable of being restored to complete independence if trained and placed in the right line of work.

2. That it is no kindness to encourage the cripple to idleness; that on the contrary every influence should be brought to bear to have him accept training and prepare for useful employment.

3. That the duty of the community is intelligently to employ him, rather than to expend equivalent energy in social entertainment or in the expression of unwise sympathy which tends more to demoralize than to build up character.

4. To make known to the public in general, and to the families of soldiers in particular, the remarkable results in the reconstruction of crippled men being attained by modern methods of medical and social science. The greatest terror in war has been the prospect of returning home disabled. It is no more than fair that mothers should know how little the loss of a limb means now to the man who is himself determined to succeed.

Beginning June 1, 1918, the American Red Cross conducted an educational campaign to create public sentiment helpful to the cripple. It would be especially appreciated if you could further this effort by speaking to your congregation on their responsibilities toward the cripple.

Your enlistment in the cause is an essential link in the chain of restoring the cripple to useful employment which will make him, in truth, no longer handicapped.

Fourteen Mistakes of Life.

1. To set up your own standard of right and wrong and judge people accordingly.

2. To measure the enjoyment of others by our own.

3. To expect uniformity of opinion in this world.

4. To look for judgment and experience in youth.

5. To endeavor to mold all dispositions alike.

6. To look for perfection in our own actions.

7. To worry ourselves and others with what cannot be remedied.

8. To refuse to yield in immaterial matters.

9. To refuse to alleviate, so far as lies in our power, all that which needs alleviation.

10. To refuse to make an allowance for the infirmities of others.

11. To consider everything impossible that we cannot perform.

12. To believe only what our own finite minds can grasp.

13. To expect to be able to understand everything.

14. To live for time alone, when any moment may launch us into eternity.—Selected.

The morning lesson from Deuteronomy (chapter 8) is one of the two chapters from which our Lord Jesus Christ derived the three principles by which He overcame the Evil one in the wilderness of temptation, the other being the sixth (used on sixth Sunday after Trinity). Moses, addressing the Hebrews at the end of their forty years' wanderings and on the eve of their entrance upon the Promised Land, reviews the past and points out to them the reasons for their experience of suffering and hardship. "He humbled thee and suffered thee to hunger and fed thee with manna in order to make thee know that man doth not live by bread only, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of the Lord." Moreover, "Thou shalt also consider in thine heart that as a man chasteneth his son, so the Lord thy God chasteneth thee." The latter part of the chapter looks to the future and is a warning against the tendency of prosperity to make men forget their dependence upon the Giver of all good.

The New Testament selection deals with the same theme of suffering: looking backward upon the long line of the heroes of the faith, and forward to the ascended and glorified Christ. "Wherefore, seeing we also are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, etc., looking unto Jesus, the author and furnisher of our faith; who for the joy that was set before Him, endured the cross, despising the shame, and is set down at the right hand of the throne of God."

Especial attention is called to the Old Testament evening lesson. It contains Jeremiah's denunciation of the Hebrews for re-enslaving their brethren (contrary to law and justice), after having set them at liberty when they thought themselves in danger of the judgment of God by means of the threatened Chaldean invasion. The Chaldeans having raised the siege because of fear of an Egyptian attack, the time servers of Jerusalem again fastened the chains of slavery upon the poor. It was as if we today in the United States should, through fear of German victory, resolve on social justice and then, believing in our ability to smash Hindenburg's line, should lapse into selfishness and injustice. The second lesson contains many valuable passages, but is entirely too long, and ministers might do well to substitute (as is allowable) one of the week day lessons; perhaps that for Monday (Mark 1:1-20), which contains the Temptation of our Lord as Son and the proclamation of the Gospel of the Kingdom of God, the Kingdom of sonship and so of brethren.

These lessons are germane to Collect, Epistle and Gospel. Nothing is more important today than faith in the providence of God and a right understanding of the Divine purpose in life, as illustrated by Israel's experience in the wilderness. The constant tendency is to measure the providence of God by what is agreeable to us instead of by His putting away from us what things are "hurtful to us" and giving us the things "profitable" for us in the highest sense; looking to the sonship of the regenerate and that suffering together with Christ which alone can take us into the true Promised Land of eternal life. "If we are children of God, then we are heirs; joint heirs with Christ; if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may also be glorified together."

The Loyal Churchwoman.

The following is from an address that might well animate every Churchwoman:

"Privilege first: 'A member of Christ, the child of God, an inheritor of the Kingdom of Heaven,' and when we believe all this, believe that God loves us, we must be good, must obey His commands, must try to follow Christ and do His will.

"There are heathen who have never heard of Christ, and heathen who have heard but never grasped the truth. Our God seeks men, our Saviour redeems men, our Holy Ghost comforts and guides in all perplexities.

"It may not much matter what Church we die in; but our Church is so beautiful to live in! Our belief in Immortality; our Holy Communion, its comforts and blessings; our Revelation of God so full of precious promise to those who study it; our 'Orders' which date back through the centuries; our Prayer Book, with its treasure store of liturgy; our Christian Year. 'Oh, with all we have, how much better we ought to be!'

"The privilege entails responsibility, the duty of sharing. We are continually sharing secular things with our friends, then why not our spiritual things—texts, religious books, anything that has been a comfort to us, may help others. We are responsible to God for our fellows: 'Ye shall not see my face unless your brother be with you!' The Church should conquer the world—the fault is in her members."

The Green Fields of Eternity.

Nancy Byrd Turner.

The green fields of eternity stretch very wide and far;
Only the shining eyes of faith can trace them where they are,
Only the earnest heart of hope can measure where they lie
Beyond a strange, uncharted sea, beneath a crystal sky—
A dear land, a clear land, a land of perfect day,
The green fields of eternity that shall not fade away.

There shine the dreams we left for lost among the former years,
There smile the eyes that yesterday were dim with mortal tears;
The forgotten things of life, the dearest and the best,
They cannot perish in that air, all beautiful and blest—
In that fair land, that rare land, where sorrow is not seen,
The green fields of eternity that always shall be green.

Ah, thither sets the tide of time forever, evermore,
The hope of all humanity is anchored on that shore;
The old winds change, the old stars fail, the old floods ebb and flow,
But steadfast up the old earth trail our pilgrim feet shall go
To the rest fields, the blest fields, where some day they shall stand—
The green fields of eternity, the Everlasting Land!

Letter Writing.

Although it may be an exaggeration to say that letter writing is a lost art, it is true that the girl of to-day seldom studies or practices it. Often she knows how to write an admirable business letter, concise and sensible, in a clear hand. She seldom forgets to date it or to mention the address to which an answer may be sent. But when it is a matter of writing letters that are not obligatory, but are intended to delight, cheer or entertain, she is not so sure to be successful.

It used to be supposed that the traveler had a duty toward those left at home that would be faithfully and gladly discharged by means of long, entertaining letters; but the picture post card has done away with all such notions. The anxious kinsfolk who are wondering whether Beatrice has lost her cough, and what she thinks of the mysterious Nile, receive a highly colored picture of the Sphinx, with the somewhat misleading message: "Here we are. More wonderful than the card shows. Love"—or a view of the desert and camels, below which is written, "Wish you were here with us."

The letters from Beatrice are written in haste and contain, as a rule, bare statements with the added word, "I'll tell you all about this when I get home"—a promise that Beatrice, although she has the best intentions, seldom carries out.

All the friends of the Halliday twins had heard of the Italian letter case, designed and tooled by a master hand, that Madam Halliday had promised to bestow on the granddaughter who wrote her the best letter during her six months' absence from her beloved America. The twins had smiled, for they were both good letter writers, according to their standards, and it did not much matter which of them received the prize; they could share it in common as they shared many other gifts.

But when Madam Halliday returned, she presented the letter case to their sister Dorothy, aged thirteen. She was gracious enough to offer explanations.

"Some one has said that the best letter is the one that comes from the heart and could not have been written by or to any other person," she said. "You both wrote newsy letters; you told me what you'd been doing, and about your friends and your new clothes, and the concerts you had attended. But Dorothy's letters were different. In the first one she told me how my cat and parrot were, and about the minister's salary being raised; and in the second, she told me how my garden was getting on, and about going down to see my old pensioner, Mrs. Lee, and how her rheumatism was."

"Your letters were clearly written and were faultlessly punctuated; but I did not offer a prize for penmanship or spelling or even grammar. Dorothy doesn't always spell correctly, and her ideas are sometimes as unformed as her handwriting. But Dorothy took pains to find out about the things that she knew I cared for. You see the difference lies here, my dears: you wrote about the things in which you were interested, and which, of course, interest me more or less; but Dorothy thought much more about me than about herself both beforehand and when she wrote. Do you suppose a blot or an occasional misspelled word outweighs that?"

After thinking about it few persons would question Madam Halliday's decision. It is surely true that one reason why correspondence between girls who have been good friends often droops and dies within a year is that the girls seldom consider each other's separate interests. Even if a girl finds letter writing a hard task and takes it up only from real affection, she will do her best when she writes to the friend whose letters are sure to bring her desired news or information, who never forgets to answer her questions, and who shows an affected interest in all that concerns her.

The brilliant girl may write an entertaining letter, full of vivid word pictures; but the every-day girl's letter, written with her distant friend's likes and dislikes in mind, may be such a heart-warming and delightful thing as to carry its own welcome and cheer its recipient for many a day.—The Youth's Companion.

Hostess Houses.

A recent bulletin of the Young Woman's Christian Association throws a bright light on the interesting subject of the Hostess House, that attractive institution that has recently come into being—one of the many new products of the great war.

The bulletin makes fascinating reading. War, it says, brought the men of America to the camps of the country, and thither shortly, in natural sequence, began to come the mothers, the sisters and the wives of the men. Camp commanders looked at the steady stream of femininity setting toward them and brought the matter before the War Department. The War Department, in its turn, appealed to the Y. W. C. A., and the result was the Hostess House, a building where the friends and relatives of the soldier are received and entertained, where the soldier himself can find a welcome at any hour—the center of the home life of that great, curious settlement, an army camp.

There are now eighty-five Hostess Houses, either in operation or definitely under construction. They are put up only at the direct request of the camp commandants. Some of the officers were at first skeptical; to-day these very officers are asking for second and even third Houses for their cantonments. Wherever colored troops are stationed in a cantonment a Hostess House is provided for them, with colored leaders directing the work. All of these centers of hospitality are a regular part of the government's war activities. The War Work Council of the National Board of the Y. W. C. A. promotes them as one phase of the Association's work for the country in this national emergency. And a unique and splendid work it is.

A Hostess House is manned, so to speak, by five women. The hostess director has general charge of everything; the social hostess is chiefly responsible for the reception of visitors; the emergency hostess looks after outside cases; the cafeteria hostess is concerned with the food; the business hostess keeps the accounts and attends to the buying. These workers are chosen, of course, with an eye to efficiency and fitness; each of them has had the kind of training that is well calculated to prepare her for that especial form of service. The director of a Hostess House must be herself and all four of the others rolled into one. Poise is at all times imperative. When a tornado rolled the roof back from the house at Camp Taylor, Ky., and then returned it to its proper place with a bang, work went right on, just as if nothing had happened.

The account goes on to tell us that the general plan of construction is the same in different parts of the country, adapted to local conditions. A large room is usually divided into two parts by a huge chimney with fireplaces on both sides. In winter a leaping fire gives cheer and warmth. In summer evergreen branches fill in the big stone opening. Interior decorators make the houses beautiful with the dignity of simple lines and harmonious colors. Gay curtains at the windows give brightness even in stormy weather. The chintz cushions in the wicker chairs are good to look at as well as comfortable to lean against.

Half the room is used for a reception hall. The other end forms the cafeteria. There is always a rest room for tired travelers. A nursery with bright quilts and curtains is waiting for the babies who come to visit their fathers. Not unusually the house contains sleeping rooms for the hostesses. One or two spare cots are frequently provided for very exceptional cases where it is impossible for women to leave camp that night. Sometimes a bad storm effectually holds them prisoners. Or the mother of a sick boy waits anxiously for a crisis in the illness.

An empty Hostess House has never yet been seen any day or any evening. Mothers, sisters, cousins, aunts, grandmothers and great-grandmothers, as well as wives in the present, past and future tense, visit with fathers, sons, brothers, uncles and husbands.

"My! ain't it nice and refined here?" commented one appreciative soldier.

The Hostess House does not shut up shop when visiting hours are over. Not only for guests does it exist, but for the soldiers themselves. In one house it has been discovered that as soon as the boys have seen their friends off on the train they come pell-mell back to seek comfort and food. Then the cafeteria, which has worked so hard all day, hands out pie and coffee to the disconsolate ones.

The cook at Camp Meade forgot her pass one morning. She told a soldier at the gate who she was.

"Are you the cook who makes that tomato soup?" asked the sentry.

"I am," she replied.

"Pass," decreed the soldier saluting. "I want some of that soup this noon."

One of the boys at Camp Jackson, South Carolina, had a happy thought. It occurred to him that in Columbia must be a good many musical instruments which were not working. The hostess suggested to a Columbia woman that occupation could be found for them at the Hostess House. In a few hours a piano, a violin, a mandolin and some guitars had been brought. The soldier amateur musicians who had no instruments were introduced to these instruments that had no players and an orchestra resulted.

The way the boys crowd the houses shows that the buildings fill a need. An officer at Camp Wadsworth, Spartanburg, asked the men why the demand for passes on Saturday night was falling off.

"Oh, we're going to the Hostess House," replied several soldiers.

So the officer came himself to see this Hostess House, and then he said that he understood why the soldiers preferred it to a city trip.

One phase alone of the Hostess House work would justify their existence. Each house is a directory, a street guide, a map, a telephone exchange, a finding bureau, and a waiting room for visitors. When a soldier is "under orders for France" his family comes to bid him good-bye if it is within coming distance. At one cantonment a father, mother and three sisters came hurrying. Their particular soldier was not at the entrance where they were to meet him. Like sensible people they went straight to the Hostess House. There they learned that the camp had three entrances.

The hostess by the aid of telephone and messenger paged each of these stations. The man was found at one of them and brought to the Hostess House.

This is surely a great improvement on the game of "cross-tag" so very often played by excited families with their impatient soldier sons, among the barracks.

An old man and his blind wife were given shelter in another camp while their boy was hunted up. A deaf mother, distracted at being unable to locate her sick boy, was finally guided to his bedside. Incidents like these are repeated over and over in every cantonment from Camp Wheeler, Georgia, to Camp Custer, Michigan.

At Balboa Park, California, they call the hostess "the lady who finds your friends."

Wandering mothers, lost in company streets, are returned to anxious sons. Homesick soldier boys are accompanied to movie shows. Rooming and boarding places in the neighborhood are found for soldiers' relatives. Mothers are chaperoned, babies fed, letters written and information given on every subject from the future life to fountain pens.

Hostess Houses are known by what they accomplish. They works praise them. In Camp Logan one soldier boy bore witness to what many soldiers are thinking. His mother arrived from Chicago on a train that was fifteen hours late. The son had gone to the rifle range.

The Travelers' Aid offered to accompany the deserted mother to a hotel. She insisted, however, upon going directly to the Hostess House. Her son had written her that that was the thing to do. The Travelers' Aid telephoned out to camp, and the hostess went into the city and brought the mother to the Hostess House in camp.

After the mother had rested, and refreshed herself with a cup of tea, she and the hostess drove the fifteen miles to the rifle range. As soon as the first enthusiastic greetings between mother and son had taken place she started to introduce her son to the hostess.

"Oh, I know who she is," interrupted the son. "She is from the Hostess House. The hostesses are the only persons who could bring my mother to the rifle range."

In another camp, a soldier who had just arrived remarked as he stepped into the Hostess House, "Gee, but it looks like heaven, doesn't it?"

"Of course, it does," replied one of the older soldiers. "Didn't I tell you so? Why don't you go over to the counter and talk with the angels?"

An Indian's Passing.

Entered into the life eternal from "High Hills," Shirley, Va., Sunday, June 23, Reuben Hardy, known also by his Indian name, Red Moon.

This Indian boy is not unknown to readers of the Southern Churchman, for reference has been made to him before in our pages. Born February 16, 1902, near White Rocks, Utah, he was adopted when but a day old by Miss Lucy N. Carter, who has been for years a faithful missionary to his tribe, the Ute Indians. With tender and maternal love Miss Carter cared for the motherless baby, bringing him, at the age of eight months for a visit to her home, "High Hills," near Shirley, Va. Into this quiet and somewhat exclusive neighborhood he came, with his passport—a smile—and won all hearts. Indeed, this same sunny smile was throughout his life the ready sign of a friendly, happy nature. It was characteristic of the little seven-year-old boy when he came again to Virginia. This time he remained quite four years, claiming the house and all of the family for his very own.

So happy was he here that, when in the West, at the age of fourteen, his health began to fail, it was but natural that his heart should turn to his adopted people and to their Eastern home. Here he longed to be and here he came, going for some weeks to a hospital for the best of medical care; but when the doctors had done all in their power to give relief, he returned to the home of his choice.

Here were spent his last two years of pain, in this rural community, where the people, though not endowed with much of this world's wealth, abounded in the "true riches" of kindly and sympathetic hearts, and where all, both white and black, united to make more easy his suffering days. And in the home itself, through sacrifice, and loving unselfish service, he was given every comfort, every wish of his heart being satisfied except his restoration to health. That God only could bestow this blessing he was well aware, saying often: "God knows best," and "Lord, help me—I know He will." He loved the matchless stories of Holy Scripture, and it was his desire to be confirmed when next the Bishop came. Though his body was weak and racked with pain yet his faith failed not, being to others also a strength and inspiration even unto the end.

He was laid to rest in the quiet cemetery of old Westover Church, Monday, June 24, at three in the afternoon.

May we not feel that his crown in Heaven, won through the patient bearing of his bitter cross, may for that very reason shine with a brighter lustre and a greater glory. And may we not gain comfort from the thought that he who was called away before he could choose his life's work here, which it had been hoped would be in ministering to his race, has been summoned to an even higher service in our Father's mansions, being made one of that redeemed throng, who are "before the throne of God, and serve Him day and night."

WAR ECONOMY CORNER.

Instead of Sugar.

The need for economy in the use of sugar is urgent, and the Food Administration is ready at every housewife's elbow with helpful suggestions along that line. "Sugar sunk in the bottom of a teacup or of a coffee cup," it says, in a recent statement, "is the same as sugar sunk in the bottom of the ocean by a submarine. It's wasted. . . . The sugar that goes to waste in the bottom of American teacups would help to sweeten life in many a French home."

Honey is a splendid sugar saver. It has flavor, wholesomeness, and excellent food value, and is used for sweetening in the same proportions as sugar, though in combination with a little less liquid. Syrups of various kinds—fruit, cane and maple—serve a like purpose. Served with cereals or fruit, made into candy, used in cakes and other cooked desserts, all of these sugar substitutes will be found delicious and satisfactory. The following is a good test receipt:

Cake without sugar: Cream a quarter of a cupful of butter or of oleomargarine and add, mixing well, two cupfuls of corn syrup and two eggs. Sift together three cupfuls of flour and a teaspoonful and a half of baking powder, add the dry mixture slowly to the liquor mixture and beat the batter well. Stir in a quarter of a cupful of raisins. Bake the batter in a moderate oven as a loaf cake, a layer cake, or small drop cakes.

The Duty of Praise.

No other duty is enjoined so often in the Scriptures as praise. The Bible is full of music. The woods in the summer days are not so full of bird-notes as this sacred book is of voices of song. Christian life can realize the Divine thought for it only by being songful. The old fable of the harp of Memnon, that it began to breathe out sweet music the moment the morning light swept its chords, has its true fulfillment in the human soul, which, the instant the light of Divine love breaks upon it, gives forth notes of gladness and praise.—J. R. Miller.

Laugh and Be Jolly.

Did you ever meet Laugh-and-be-jolly?
If you haven't, I wish that you had.
To look at his face in the gloomiest place
Will make any murmurer glad.

He is chubby with romping and laughter,
He is crinkled with humor and fun;

To stay melancholy with Laugh-and-be-jolly
Is to do what nobody has done.

When the heavens are drizzling and drippy
It's a mercy to have him about;

For he chuckles away on the dreariest day
Till he looks like the sun coming out.

Knock him down, he is up with a scramble,
Ignore him, he smiles all the same;

Call him frisky or simple, he just shows a dimple
That puts any crosspatch to shame.

Take your grumps and your growls and your grouches
And carry them all to this elf;

He will show you his way, and make you some day
A Laugh-and-be-jolly yourself!

Physical Geography.

"I'm sorry," said Uncle Owen, regretfully, "but I can't let you take part in a picnic at Locust Point this afternoon. If the picnickers had chosen another day, now, or another place—"

His two guests tried hard to swallow their disappointment. Andy folded up the note of invitation in silence, and Lou gazed out of the window and raised her eyebrows to keep back the tears. Uncle Owen was a fine person to visit, but surely he was a little too cautious. Now, why shouldn't this day suit for a picnic as well as any other?

Their uncle seemed to read their minds. "For two reasons," he said. "One is, that the tide is very low this afternoon. That means that in bathing you would go much further from land than you realize, and the shore at Locust Point shelves dangerously. The other is that a thunder storm is in the air, and a severe one, too, I think. I told Ted Adkins so when he brought the note."

When he had left the room the brother and sister looked at each other ruefully.

"Of course, I know he thinks it's going to storm," choked Lou, "but, pshaw, the sky looks just the way it's looked for a week. O dear!"

Andy gave a sigh of disappointment. "He's probably mistaken about the tide," he said, a little loftily. "How can he tell, this far away from the river? But, of course, we mustn't fuss, Lou. Here, come on and let's make up that studying we promised father to do. It will take our minds off the picnic."

An hour later when Uncle Owen passed the door, Andy waved a book at him. "Won't you come in and help us with this?" he asked. "You can't say rusty on it, as you did about the Latin yesterday, for father told us how you used to beat him at it."

"What's it about?" Uncle Owen asked, as he drew up a chair.

"O the earth, and the air, and the tides—" At the last word Andy broke off suddenly and colored.

"And the winds, and the weather," added Lou. Slowly she, also, began to turn red. "And—and rivers," she went on, as though unable to help herself.

"Oho," said Uncle Owen. "Physical geography?" He did not seem to notice their confusion. "I used to be pretty good at it, sure enough, but I haven't opened a book of that kind for years."

Andy could not help glancing at Lou a little triumphantly. Lou gave her uncle a puzzled look.

He laughed. "Well, I'll have to explain," he said. "After a dozen unexpected duckings I learned how to tell a 'cirrus' cloud from a 'nimbus' cloud well enough to keep fairly dry."

"We're studying about them in this very chapter," admitted Andy, slowly. "But I never thought of watching the sky for them."

"And once," went on Uncle Owen, "I was nearly drowned at Locust Point, at low tide. Stepped right over the edge of a shelf in the river bed. I had to learn from old sister Experience, you see—a mighty hard way."

The two children looked thoughtful. Suddenly thunder rumbled deeply in the direction of Locust Point; the trees began to twist and bend. Uncle Owen got up. "The picnic crowd will be charging in here, pretty soon," he said. "We'd better ask Mary to light the kitchen fire to dry 'em out. And by the way," he added, "there's iced lemonade and chocolate cake in the dining room; it will freshen you up after studying. Come along."

Five minutes later Lou looked across a big slice of cake to the drenched window-pane. "Whew, I'm glad I'm indoors!" she said.

Andy brought out his apology like a man. "We'd be like two wet hens this minute," he said, "but for Uncle Owen—and physical geography."

How An Eskimo Knows His Age.

Open to your map of Greenland, and far up in the northwestern part of that country live the little Eskimos, of which a writer says:

The people have no books. They can neither read nor write. But they can tell you right away how old each fat little Eskimo playing about the hut in the snow and cold is, by looking into a bag.

"What a funny bag," you say, "to be able to tell anybody's age."

This is the way it is:

When a baby comes to an Eskimo's house, or "igloo," a fur bag is given to the little one. He is to keep this bag as long as he lives.

Every year when the sun comes once more after the long, cold Greenland night, a bone is put into a little bag. So when you look into the bag and see seven bones, for instance, you know that the little owner is seven years old.—Selected.

Peter Rory.

"Take Peter to Cousin Mary's? What do you suppose we could do with Peter on the train? Put him in your stocking cap? What an idea! To begin with, you couldn't get him in; and if you did, he wouldn't stay."

A twinkle in mother's eye sent Teddy rushing after Peter and the stocking cap. In went Peter unprotestingly, and Teddy covered all but a fluffy gray head, which stayed put most accommodatingly, while the purr never ceased.

"What a cat!" said mother. "If you lose him, don't blame me. Now, let him out."

After all the things were packed in the suitcase, into the stocking cap again went Peter Rory, still purring like the happy little cat that he was.

The "ten-cent man" stared at his unusual passenger, but Peter only cuddled down a bit more comfortably and enjoyed the ride. He pricked up an ear as the train puffed into the station, sighed a little at the unwonted hustle, and still purred on.

"What a cat!" said mother.

In the train was a boy who was constantly whining and teasing for fruit and candy and funny papers. His distracted mother begged him to be quiet, but he still fidgeted and teased.

"Take Peter down to him," whispered mother, and Teddy tucked Peter Rory up in his arms and went down the aisle.

"Want to see my happy kitty?" he asked.

The whining boy was inclined to be afraid of Peter until Teddy assured him that Peter would not scratch. He gingerly put out a hand to pat, and out came a pink tongue to kiss, while the saw mill purr still purred.

"Isn't he cute, and isn't he happy! Guess I'll be happy too," and the fretting and whining ceased, and by and by Teddy and Peter went back to mother.

Across the aisle was a very crabbed-looking old man. He scowled and scowled at Peter and said quite loudly: "Cats should not be allowed in this car." By and by he began to watch Peter wash his face. With slow grace and precision he cleaned over first one ear and then the other, stopping now and then to gaze with friendly interest at the passengers and, still purring quite contentedly, cuddled down to sleep.

"Queer cat," said the old gentleman. "Most comfortable creature I ever saw. Makes me want a nap myself." And he rested his head against the car seat and fell asleep.

When Cousin Mary opened her door for mother and Teddy and saw Peter's gray head poking up out of his stocking cap nest, she exclaimed: "Well, of all things! Just what I've been wishing for. The mice are playing tag all over my house."

As if he understood, Peter Rory, like the accommodating cat he was, jumped out of the stocking cap and skittered into the shed.

"It's shut up," Cousin Mary assured Teddy. "We'll see just how smart your funny little gray puffball is."

In just half an hour came a scratching at the shed door; and when he was allowed to enter, Peter Rory proudly bore a large, fat mouse, which he deposited at Cousin Mary's feet.

"Smart kitty!" praised Cousin Mary. "You shall have a saucerful of country cream right now, and to-morrow you shall have a big slice of our Sunday chicken."

Teddy was just learning to count, so keeping up with Peter's mice was almost too much for him. The visit lasted four days, and Cousin Mary said three mice a day were a great many for a small, gray pussy cat. Perhaps you can tell how many mice Peter Rory caught during his stocking cap visit.—Helen P. Aldrich, in Christian Register.

"Better Than Lemonade."

A big pink bow appeared over the top of the high board fence, then a mop of sunny brown curls and a pair of bright brown eyes.

"Janie! Ja-a-nee-eee!"

A little rosy-cheeked girl in a plaid gingham dress scrambled up from the floor of the back porch, and the tower she was building with a-b-c blocks fell with a crash. Baby Louise crowded with delight.

"Here I am," answered Jane, leaning over the railing; "what do you want?"

"Come over and play croquet. It's all shady on that side of the yard, and Mary and Constance are coming, and mother may make lemonade," called Rena Snow, in a shrill, excited voice.

"I'll ask mother," said Janie Wood, eagerly. She took baby's fat little hand and led her into the back hall.

"Is that you, Janie?" came from the sitting-room. "I was just going to call you."

She opened the door and went in. Mrs. Wood was tying up a bundle in brown paper. "Will you do an errand for me, Janie?" she asked. "I want you to carry some roses to Mrs. Southerland."

Janie stood quite still. Mrs. Southerland lived at the other end of the village; it would be almost supper time when one had walked to her house and back.

"I am very anxious for her to have the roses," said Mrs. Wood. "I will stay here and keep baby, for I don't feel well enough to take the long walk."

"I will go, mother," said Janie, and swallowed a big lump in her throat. There would be no croquet for her, she knew, and no lemonade.

"Thank you, my dear little girl," Janie's mother leaned over and kissed her. "Now, put on your clean blue gingham and your tan sandals. By the time you are dressed I will have the roses in a basket all ready for you to carry."

It was a very sober little girl who trudged down the dusty street half an hour later. But the roses in the basket were very lovely, and the pleased expression on her mother's face was pleasant to remember. If only the children in the yard next door had not seemed to be having such a merry time when Janie passed! Tears came to her eyes when she thought of it, and once a bright drop fell into the dust and rolled over and over like a little ball. But at last the big, fine house was reached, and Mrs. Southerland was seen sitting on the front porch. Janie smoothed back her hair and wondered if there were any tear stains on her cheeks.

As she went up the stone steps Mrs. Southerland came to meet her. She seemed very glad to see Janie, and made her sit in a big rocking chair while she went to take the roses out of the basket. She stayed away a long time, Janie thought. The shadows were growing long; soon the children would stop playing croquet. There might be rain to-morrow—perhaps for a whole week—and there could be no croquet. Janie leaned back in the chair and closed her eyes.

"Janie," called Mrs. Southerland, "come into the house. I have something to tell you." Janie obeyed, and followed Mrs. Southerland into a large, beautifully furnished bed-room.

"My little niece from the city is here for a few days," she said, "and I am going to have a surprise supper for her to-night. There are to be twelve little girls here, and you are to be one of them. I have just telephoned to your mother and she says you may stay if you wish. Do you?"

Janie was so surprised she could hardly speak. Her face grew crimson, and she hung her head a little. At last she managed to stammer out a timid, "Yes'm."

"Then you shall stay," said Mrs. Southerland.

"Maybe I'd better—not," said Janie, looking down at her plain gingham dress and brown sandals.

"Yes, I want you to stay," said the sweet lady, smiling. "I asked your mother if I might dress you in one of my little niece's white dresses, and she said I might. And she has some white slippers which would fit you, I know. And would you like a pink sash or a blue one?"

"Blue!" cried Janie, her eyes shining.

"Then I am going to dress you right away, for Doris will be home soon. I sent her to a neighbor's, so she would not know about the surprise supper."

As Janie went to wash her face she could not help clapping her hands softly. She was thinking of three things: of the croquet game she missed, of the surprise supper, and the ride home in the Southerlands' big automobile; and last of all, of the smile on her mother's tired face when she had agreed so willingly to carry the roses.

"Better than lemonade!" she whispered to herself, as she splashed her hands in the water.—The Child's Gem.

A Knight of the Saddle.

Perry mounted his new rocking-horse gaily, with a skillful toss into the saddle. For weeks he had practised that toss on the barn fence while waiting for the sixth birthday that would bring this fine steed, almost as large as a real colt, and gay with creaking leather and shiny trappings. It had been stabled on the front porch all night, its stall a wooden crate, ready to be led out on the birthday morning. And that morning Perry waked before sunrise, and ate his breakfast as swiftly as mother would allow, darting out, as soon as possible, to take possession of his treasure.

Now, at last, the moment was here, and the rider bounded up and down, trotting gallantly, feet in stirrups and hand carelessly holding the black bridle. The porch was checkered with the shadow of flickering leaves, and he almost fancied himself a knight of old, bound on some fine quest through the aisle of a big forest. He felt that he could ride forever.

Presently, he noticed a rosebush in the corner of the yard; it seemed to shake, now and then, rather strangely. Looking closer, he discovered two eyes above it, peering through the fence palings. They were very big eyes, and very bright. The horseman knew almost instantly to whom they belonged—they and the shock of yellow hair that bristled over them. It was not easy to mistake the washerwoman's little lame Carl, from away down-town.

Perry turned his head away and, speaking to Black Prince in an undertone, rode harder and faster. A tiny cross feeling stirred in his heart; the sunlight between the leaf shadows seemed to darken, somehow. Yet he could not keep from looking again; and each time the eyes appeared rounder and brighter.

"I wish," said Perry to himself, "that he'd move on and stop staring so."

For fifteen minutes more, horse and rider went on in swift, glad flight. The boy felt as if he could ride forever. "Prince is not even lathered," he said to himself, and his heart beat high.

At last the rosebush gave a final quiver, there was a scuffle behind it, and the big eyes and yellow hair disappeared. Tap-tap, very slowly two crutches sounded on the sidewalk, dragging a little as they moved off. Black Prince's fight began to flag. Presently he was pulled up sharply, and his rider dismounted with suddenness. "Carl Hoffman!" a clear voice called, "won't you take a ride?"

The dragging crutches halted and wheeled, then beat a quick tattoo up the walk to the porch. "I'll draw up this hassock, and we'll call it a horse block," planned Perry. "Then you can mount easily."

Very slowly, yet very surely, stopping to take breath now and again, needing not a little help, but eagerly, earnestly, Carl Hoffman, without a word, climbed to the back of the marvelous steed. Once up, his crutches slipped useless to the floor; his hand caught the reins with a horseman's grip. "How you sit him!" exclaimed Perry, admiringly.

That was a great hour, Black Prince did his noble best. The rider's little twisted feet fitted firmly into their stirrups: what did it matter now if they had never taken a step like other boys? His round shoulders, hunched from much carrying of crutches, straightened themselves bravely; the shock of hair blew back in the wind. He rode and rode and rode. Passers-by looked in and smiled. "I tell you," shrilled lame Carl, "this is a horse!"

A voice floated down from upstairs. "Perry-boy, your horse will ride you to death!"

"Oh, mother," Perry cried, running to the foot of the steps, "Please come down here and look at Carl Hoffman on Black Prince. You wouldn't know him!"—S. S. Times.

A Little Missionary of Sunshine.

Nanette had been "shut in" for a whole long month, but now she was well again. So she crept out of the small, brown house at the end of the ugly, narrow street that dull morning, and, holding her clothespin dolly in her arms, sat on the doorstep, and looked about her.

Nobody had missed her, of course; nobody was glad she was "up and about" again, she told herself, but that dreary morning, as she sat quite alone, she began to sing a favorite song of hers, and the laundryman stopped to listen.

"Bless that child!" he said, "she puts me in a good humor every time I hear her. I surely have missed her this past month."

And just then the window flew up in the tall brick house across the alley, and a pale young face looked out. She was a cripple and had been in such pain all night she couldn't sleep; but as the little song floated up to her, such a cheerful, gay sort of tune, the lame girl smiled.

"I used to sing that myself—a long time ago," she said, and, humming the air, she went back to her work, looking brighter and happier.

The iceman came then, and, finding he had left his tickets at home, he jerked his horse so that the bit hurt him cruelly. He was sorry for it the next moment, for as he listened to the small singer on the doorstep he began to feel "different." "She does seem gay and happy still, no matter what happens, and I've missed her a whole lot from this alley lately."

And as the grocer boy came by, the sewing woman next door, the cross old scissors grinder, the sick lady, and a number of other people, the gay little voice went on with the cheerful song.

It was wonderful how much sunshine the child gave out from her lowly seat as she sang this merry tune over and over.—The Child's Gem.

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

Rt. Rev. David Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Death of a Clergyman: The Rev. Ernest Andrew Rennie, rector of Christ Church, Covington, passed away on July 6 at Toronto, Canada, where he had been for about a month for the benefit of his health, and the funeral was held on July 8 at Wyckliffe College, with temporary interment at Toronto. Mr. Rennie came to this Diocese in 1900, after having been ordained deacon at Orillia, Canada, by the Lord Bishop of Niagara. He served six years as curate to the late Dr. Henry H. Waters, at St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, and was ordained priest in that church in September, 1900, by Bishop Sessums. During his connection with St. Paul's, his chief work was as missionary to the various charitable institutions in the city and missions on the lower coast of the Mississippi River. In 1906 he accepted charge of Christ Church, Covington, where he remained until the time of his death. Born in Barton, Ontario, in 1861, he was educated at the Ontario Agricultural College at Guelph, graduating in 1889. Later he entered the Mills Training School in Bellevue Hospital, New York City, graduating from there in 1893. Returning to Canada, he entered Wyckliffe Divinity College, from which institution he graduated in 1898. It being his intention in early life to go into the missionary field, he also took a course in dentistry, so as to be thoroughly equipped to serve his fellowman. During the twelve years of service in Covington, he succeeded in building up a good congregation and established missions at Slodell, Bogalusa, Mandeville and Franklinton. A man of a very lovable disposition, he was always ready to help those in distress, and his loss will be keenly felt, not alone by his own parishioners, but by many others, as he knew no creed when called upon to help those in distress. His life was one of self-sacrifice, and his aim was to follow the example of his Master in going about doing good. He leaves a widow and one little girl, and the sympathy of all church people in the Diocese is extended to them in their hour of sorrow. It is the intention of the family to later Whittle: Entered into life everlasting, July 13, 1918, FORTESCUE WHITTLE, eldest son of the late Rt. Rev. and Mrs. F. M. Whittle.

Father, in Thy gracious keeping
Leave we now Thy servant sleeping.

MR. FORTESCUE WHITTLE.

Entered into life eternal early Saturday morning, July 13, 1918, at the Memorial Hospital, Roanoke, Va., FORTESCUE WHITTLE, son of the late Rt. Rev. F. McN. Whittle, in the sixty-eighth year of his age.

At the time of Morning Prayer, in the Good Shepherd Memorial Church, Petersburg, on Sunday, the 14th, the burial service was read by the Rev. F. G. Kibble, assisted by the Rev. F. G. Scott, after which he was lovingly borne by members of his Bible class to Blandford Cemetery, where he was laid to rest to await the resurrection of the just.

At a joint meeting of the Chapel Committee and the Whittle Bible class of the Good Shepherd Memorial Church, the following preamble and resolutions were adopted:

Whereas, it has pleased our heavenly Father to take unto Himself our friend and teacher, Mr. Fortescue Whittle; therefore,

Be it resolved, That while we bow in humble submission to the Divine will, we are deeply sensible of the great loss that our Church has sustained. For more than twenty-two years, as teacher of the Whittle Bible class, he set before the men, by example and precept, the highest ideal of Christian living. To this class he gave his very best—unselfish interest, careful preparation and gentle patience. He taught the simple gospel, and because his own faith was great and because in humility he hid himself behind his message, he spoke with authority. Our church was his spiritual home, and he bring his body to be buried in New Orleans.

The Boy Scouts and choir boys of St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, numbering thirty-five, had a most enjoyable outing of ten days on a farm at Hazlehurst, Miss., at the invitation of one of the members of the parish, in charge of the Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, rector and Scout Master; leaving on June 25 and returning on July 5. On Sunday, June 30, the rector celebrated Holy Communion at 7:30 A. M., for those who had been confirmed, and later that morning held a service in the woods. The boys spent a most delightful time in taking hikes, swimming and other forms of outdoor pleasure.

Personal Notes

The Rev. Charles Clingman, rector of the Church of the Incarnation, Dallas, Texas, has accepted a call to become rector of Trinity Church, Houston. He will succeed the Rev. Clinton S. Quin, Bishop-Coadjutor-elect of the Diocese of Texas. Mr. Clingman will assume his new duties October 15th.

The Rev. George H. Hills, rector of Grace Church, Avondale, Cincinnati, has been granted a year's leave of absence and expects to take up work immediately with the Y. M. C. A. in France.

The Rev. Frederic F. H. Nason, who now has charge of the Chapel of the Holy Ghost, Prudence, R. I., will in the fall become curate of Grace Church, Brooklyn, N. Y.

The Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, D. D., rector of St. Peter's Church, St. Louis, Mo., expects to spend six months in special volunteer religious work at the front.

The Rev. Nathan W. Stanton, rector of St. Mark's Church, Buffalo, N. Y., who has been acting as Archdeacon of Buffalo since the death of Archdeacon Ayres last December, has now been appointed Archdeacon, and will resign his parish in order to give his entire time to the work.

The Rev. Edmund J. Cleveland, rector of the Church of St. Philip the Apostle, St. Louis, Mo., has been granted a leave of absence, and is now in the training camp for chaplains at Louisville, Ky.

Lieutenant E. H. Earle, chaplain of the 132nd Field Artillery, has been detailed to act as chaplain at the new infantry replacement depot, Camp McArthur, Waco, Texas.

Ordinations.

In the Church of the Good Shepherd, Nashua, N. H., Mr. George Herbert Seavey was recently ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Parker, who also preached the sermon. The candidate was presented by the Rev. William Porter Niles, rector of the church.

In the Church of the Holy Trinity, Lincoln, Nebr., on Sunday, June 23, the Bishop of Nebraska ordained to the diaconate his nephew, Gowan Clarence Williams, and the Rev. Louis Eugene Wettling to the priesthood. The Rev. Carl M. Worden presented Mr. Williams, and the Rev. Dr. S. Mills Hayes, rector of the parish, presented Mr. Wettling and also preached the sermon.

On June 19, the Rev. Walter F. Borchert, for the past year minister-in-charge of St. Paul's Church, Wilimantic, Conn., was advanced to the priesthood by Bishop Acheson in that church.

In Trinity Church, Rutland, Vermont, on Sunday, June 23, the Bishop of the Diocese advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Hugh David Jones, who was presented by the Rev. H. P. Scratchley. The Rev. W. H. Bamford preached the sermon, and the Rev. Joseph Reynolds, rector of the parish, assisted the Bishop in celebrating the Holy Communion.

Summer Addresses.

The address of Bishop Harding, of Washington, is changed to Haven, Me., for the summer.

The Rev. A. M. Lewis, of Oskaloosa, Iowa, will be at 1232 South Fifty-first Street, Philadelphia, Pa., for the remainder of July and August.

LETTERS FROM RHEUMATICS

Possibly you have imagined that you could never get your own consent to write a testimonial letter, but if you have ever experienced the excruciating pains of Rheumatism you can at least appreciate the feelings of those who have been relieved of this terrible disease by drinking the Mineral Water from the justly celebrated Shivar Spring at Shelton, S. C. This water overcomes many diseases, including Indigestion, Gout, Uric Acid Poisoning and Liver and Kidney diseases, but no patrons of the Spring are more enthusiastic in their praise of the water than those who have been relieved of their Rheumatism. Hundreds of letters like the following have been received by the Management:

Dr. Cosby, a South Carolina physician writes:—"I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of Rheumatism, Chronic Indigestion, Kidney and Bladder troubles and in Nervous and Sick Headaches and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the Liver, Kidneys and Bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter."

Dr. Avant, of Savannah, writes:—"I suffered for years with a most aggravating form of stomach disorder and consulted a number of our best local physicians, went to Baltimore and consulted specialists there and still I was not benefited. I had about despaired of living when I began to use Shivar Spring Water and in a short time was cured."

Mr. Rhodes, of Virginia, writes:—"Please send me ten gallons of Shivar Spring Water quickly. I want it for Rheumatism. I know of several who were cured of Rheumatism with this water."

Editor Cunningham writes:—"The water has done more good than any medicine I have ever taken for Rheumatism. Am entirely free from pain."

Mr. McClam, of South Carolina, writes:—"My wife has been a sufferer from Rheumatism and after drinking twenty gallons of your Mineral Water was entirely cured of the horrible disease."

Mr. Carter, of Virginia, writes:—"Mrs. Carter has had enlarged joints upon her hands, caused by Rheumatism. Shivar Spring Water removed every trace of the enlargement. The water is simply excellent."

If you suffer with Rheumatism, or with any chronic disease, accept the guarantee offer below by signing your name. Clip and mail to the Shivar Spring.

Box 64-R, Shelton, S. C.
Gentlemen:

I accept your guarantee offer and enclose herewith two dollars for ten gallons of Shivar Mineral Spring Water. I agree to give it a fair trial, in accordance with instructions contained in booklet you will send, and if it fails to benefit my case, you agree to refund the price in full upon receipt of the two empty demijohns, which I agree to return promptly.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great. In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

Every profession a man makes will sooner or later be tested.

Whoever will do good will find life too short for the work he will find to do.

Great things can be done by the weakest man who is willing to trust in God and do his best.

Prayer is not conquering God's reluctance, but taking hold of God's willingness.—Phillips Brooks.

However Christians may be unlike in other respects, not one neglects devotional reading and private prayer.

One question every man is answering by his life: What think ye of Christ? The answer determines his destiny.

To be aware of God means that we must see Him in nature and in history, that we must perceive Him in the lives of our fellow-men, and we must find Him in the recesses of our souls.—George Wharton Pepper.

Thou art the true peace of the heart. Thou art its only rest. Out of Thee all things are full of trouble and unrest. In this peace that is in Thee, the one chiefest eternal good, I will lay me down and sleep.—Thomas a Kempis.

Be ready. Your business is to be ready. Have your tools well sharpened, and know how to handle them. The place will come to you, the best place for you, if you are not so much looking after that which meets your taste, as after that which proves you to be a vessel fit for the Master's use.—C. H. Spurgeon.

God gives us joy that we may give, He gives us love that we may share, Sometimes He gives us loads to lift That we may learn to bear. For life is gladder when we give And love is sweeter when we share, And heavy loads rest lightly, too, When we have learned to bear. —The Comrade.

The heavy thought is the thought of what we were, of what we hoped and purposed to have been, of what we ought to have been, of what but for ourselves we might have been, set by the side of what we are. This is a thought the crushing weight of which nothing but a strength above our own can lighten.—Julius C. Hare.

"My inmost soul, O Lord, to Thee Leans like a growing flower Upon the light. I do not know The day nor blessed hour When that deep-rooted, daring growth We call the heart's desire Shall burst and blossom to a prayer Within the sacred fire Of Thy great patience; grow so pure, So still, so sweet a thing, As perfect prayer must surely be."

It is one of the refreshing thoughts connected with the future life that is made entirely from metal. Is known all over this country. Three thousand churches have found that it is economy to use the Zephyr. For further information write to THE ZEPHYR ELECTRIC ORGAN BLOWER COMPANY, Orville, Ohio.

Please state in what paper you saw this.

these fragile bodies will no longer be ringing their clamorous complaints in our ears. We shall have done with the everlasting recurring questions which assail as much the king on his throne as the peasant in his hut—"What shall we eat, and what shall we drink, and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" The evening will not find us worn down with fatigue or oppressed with sorrow, and yielding the night to sleep that we may have strength for the day's toil. "Night," did I say? "There shall be no night there."—H. A. Boardman.

Righteous Wrath.

There are many kinds of hate, as many kinds of fire; And some are fierce and fatal with murderous desire; And some are mean and craven, revengeful, selfish, slow, They hurt the man that holds them more than they hurt his foe.

And yet there is a hatred that purifies the heart, The anger of the better against the baser part, Against the false and wicked, against the tyrant's sword, Against the enemies of love, and all that hate the Lord.

O cleansing indignation, O flame of righteous wrath, Give me a soul to see Thee and follow in Thy path! Save me from selfish virtue, arm me for fearless fight, And give me strength to carry on, a soldier of the Right! —Dr. Henry Van Dyke, in the "Outlook."

SOUTHERN CHURCHMAN, Richmond, Va.

Read the Newspapers.

Very few know how to read a newspaper. Yet how else can they find out what is going on in the world?

"I never look at a newspaper," is the answer of some, but it is nothing to boast of. It simply means that the person who says it knows little of the world's happenings and does not care how ignorant he is.

What would you think of a man who ordered everything on the bill of fare in the restaurant? He would be foolish, of course. Many people are just as foolish in reading their newspapers. They read all the tales of scandal and crime instead of reading only that which is worth while.

It is hard to pick out the worthwhile things in most papers, but with a little study and practice one can soon learn to read everything of importance in any paper within fifteen minutes.

Here are a few suggestions to help in picking out the things worth reading:

1. Read only those things which interest a number of people.
2. Read only the things that are constructive and helpful.
3. Try to pick out the events that have State or national importance.
4. Look for the things that are going to make big changes in history, such as events in Congress, causes and results of wars, conventions and conferences, scientific discoveries, etc.
5. Pay no attention to murders, robberies, divorce suits, etc.

Spend the time that you save on your newspaper in reading a good book. Never say you do not have time to read the paper. Anyone can afford fifteen minutes a day. The busiest people in the world are the ones who are most anxious to spend a few minutes every day with their newspapers.—Selected.

Consider the untold capacities for high saintliness which lie buried in the mass of men who, as yet, know nothing of grace and truth. Our cities—these great hives of agglomerated human beings—abound with men and women who are, in the eye of society—who are, it may be, in the eye of the law—among the worst and the vilest, but who have bright and clear understandings, who have warm and generous hearts; who need but the illumination of truth, and the invigorating touch of grace, to become great in the true sense of that much misused word. "I have much people in this city," was the motto traced by Christ Himself over one of the most vicious towns of ancient heathendom. Humanity is like a mine wherein flints and diamonds lie side by side in indistinguishable disorder, until the light of Divine knowledge is poured in upon the buried mass, and the hidden beauties of lives outwardly degraded are revealed. How often does it happen that the found are greater, far greater, than the finder; that Peter, in the event, takes precedence altogether of Andrew.—Canon Liddon.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

A NEW WAR SERVICE FOR THE CLERGY.

The Committee on Public Information, created by executive order of the President in April, 1917, has accomplished an untold amount of work in its special field. It has instructed the whole nation on those subjects connected with the war—the causes of it, the reason, purpose and methods of the Government in prosecuting it—which it was necessary that the people should grasp intelligently in order that every citizen should give his utmost support to the country's cause. Few realize how largely the press, the platform and even the pulpit have been indebted to this agency for the accurate and authoritative information and the interesting presentation of fact and argument which they in turn have given to the public, and what a force this educational campaign has been throughout the country. It has been behind every appeal and every "drive," and the remarkable unanimity of sentiment which animates the people of this great land is largely due to its wise and abundant propagandism. Conscious of the righteousness of its cause the policy of the Government has been to "instruct the people and trust the people," a truly democratic rule and one that has been fully justified by the result. Except where there has been positive and vicious disloyalty to be dealt with, our people have responded in just the degree in which they have apprehended the situation.

About a year ago a nation-wide organization of voluntary speakers known as the "Four-Minute Men" was created as a division of this committee's activities with the approval of the President. It is in charge of a special director, and in every State, and every county and city, are Chairmen under whom the speakers are enrolled, instructed and apportioned. The efficiency of the system has depended largely, of course, upon these Chairmen. If they have failed to "make good" in any community it is quite competent for any good citizen to inquire into the matter and see that this agency is properly used. Heretofore the field of these Four-Minute speakers has been almost exclusively the motion-picture theatres, under special arrange with their proprietors, but we do not understand that their services were to be confined absolutely to this one place and method. The official directions state that "where there are other gatherings suitable for the purpose, the privilege of speaking is a matter of mutual arrangement between the Local Chairman and the proper authorities in charge of such meetings."

The organization is now moving to extend its operation to the churches, and to enlist the services of the clergy in this important work. In an official communication sent us from the New York Division of Four-Minute Men the plan is outlined and the hearty welcome that has been given it in greater New York is emphasized. The National Director, we are informed, is in full accord with the organization work in that city, and "it is a matter of only a short time when the national organization will begin." It is thought, however, "that the churches themselves would prefer to meet the Government half way in perfecting it," and to this end the judgment of our clergy is invited. Communications may be sent to Nat Olds, Chairman, Church Section, Four-Minute Men, 53 East 44th Street, New York.

The first idea was to ask that good lay speakers should be given opportunity to address the congregations in the churches for a four-minute period, but very wisely this was abandoned, and it was decided to make the ministers themselves Four-Minute Men. This leaves it with them when and how they shall speak the messages which the Government assigns to them to deliver and in what suitable terms. They will be furnished with bulletins and other official publications from Washington, written by experts of the first ability, and probably specially prepared for their purposes. These bulletins are authoritative, and the clergyman, if he chooses, may claim the position of an authorized representative of the Government. Doubtless most of our clergy will prefer to deliver these messages under the sanction of a yet higher ambassadorship, at least when addressing their own congregations from the chancel. But their commission will be a wider one and not limited to their own congregations; for whenever opportunity offers and arrangements can be made they are supposed to be ready to render this service promptly, tactfully and with effect.

Among the larger congregations in our cities and towns such propaganda is probably little needed. In the smaller churches, however, and among people who have less opportunity of knowing fully the facts, principles and duties involved in this holy war the case is different, and it is a worthy task on the part of their spiritual teachers to make them know these things. Particularly in rural districts the need of such definite and intelligent information is often great and the opportunities for giving it can be found or made by those who are watchful and in earnest, especially if they are working under an efficient organization. For their own sake as well as for the country's sake it is most important that all our people should be taught the whole truth concerning war and its issues so that they can give the intelligent and whole-souled service which is demanded of every true man and woman and be prepared to take a worthy part in the reconstruction that must follow. We believe the plan for the extension of the Four-Minute Men organization to include the clergy will prove a valuable means to this end, and that it will be welcomed and heartily adopted by the clergy of this Church.

Following is an extract from President Wilson's letter to the Four-Minute Men, addressed to them last November:

"Men and nations are at their worst or at their best in any great struggle. The spoken word may light the fires of passion and unreason, or it may inspire to highest action and noblest sacrifice a nation of freemen. Upon you Four-Minute Men, who are charged with a special duty and enjoy a special privilege in the command of your audiences, will rest in a considerable degree the task of arousing and informing the great body of our people so that when the record of these days is complete we shall read page for page with the deeds of army and navy the story of the unity, the spirit of sacrifice, the unceasing labors, the high courage of the men and women at home who held unbroken the inner lines. My best wishes and continuing interest are with you in your work as part of the reserve officers' corps in a nation thrice armed because through your efforts it knows better the justice of its cause and the value of what it defends.

 "Cordially and sincerely yours,
 "WOODROW WILSON."

THE GERMAN-AFRICAN COLONIES.

Through the courtesy of Bishop Osborne we have received a copy of an open letter addressed to General Smuts, lately commanding the British forces operating against the German possessions in South Africa, by the Bishop of Zanzibar and head of the Universities Mission in the Eastern Districts of German East Africa. Bishop Weston was alarmed last fall at signs indicating that there were some in England who were willing to end the war before the liberty of all the weak and oppressed peoples of the world should be assured to them as pledged by the British Government and our own President. He fears this would mean the restoration to Germany of her African Colonies rescued from her hands by British arms, and his letter is a burning plea that this shall not be done. He speaks from personal knowledge of the systematic cruelties and injustice practiced upon the Africans and their reduction to practical slavery of the most brutal type at the hands of their oppressors, and sums up the situation in these words of evidently studied moderation:

"German rule is impossible. The German does not understand the elementary principles of humane Government. He is efficient, he is polite, he is correct in his behaviour and in his official attitude, but he is a German. And being a German, he sees a native as a tool; he is cruel and inhuman, and under him the African must become a slave or die. * * * The average German is incompetent to rule Africans. The Peace Conference that shall allow him to try again will be guilty of the wilful betrayal of liberty, and of the rights of the weakest people of the earth."

General Smuts says of this letter that "it contains a very solemn plea to the conscience of the British people, backed by an imposing array of solid facts." Let us hope that these facts will not be forgotten when the limits of German domination shall be assigned to her at the conclusion of the great war.

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

The Rich Man's Poverty and the Poor Man's Wealth; and Other Practical Talks. By the Rev. George Thomas Dowling, D. D. Churchman Company, New York. Pp. 96. $1.00.

Readers of our contemporary, The Churchman, of New York, are familiar with the "Saturday Night Sermons" which until lately have been appearing in its columns. The twenty-five "talks" contained in this little volume are selections from these, and many of Dr. Dowling's readers will be glad to have them preserved in this form. They are short and readable and, except for a certain provincialism in the choice of illustrations, are in every way admirable. Religion and common-sense are admirably blended here to the advantage of both.

The Theory and Practice of Mysticism.

By the Rev. Charles Morris Addison, D. D., Rector of St. John's Church, Stamford, Conn. E. P. Dutton & Company, New York. Pp. 216. $1.50.

In these strenuous days the title is apt to strike one as ill-timed and incongruous. It is no time, we say, for men to sit a-dreaming, if that is what mysticism means. But our very positiveness on this point may well give us pause for a moment to ask whether our activities and the anxious stress of the hour do not of themselves demand more time and better trained faculties for spiritual contemplation and communion with the unseen. Of the most successful man of his age it was said, "Behold, this dreamer cometh." His dreams came true, and "his bow abode in strength by the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob," because, somehow, he was in such close touch with God. It may not be amiss to hear what this student of mysticism can tell us of this way of knowing or feeling God.

These lectures were delivered three years ago to the Episcopal Theological School at Cambridge, and later to the Theological Department of the University of the South. The psychology as well as the history and method of mysticism is presented fully and reasonably, but it is the practice of it as an art in the religious life that the author would urge upon his readers. But even to one to whom the whole process of training and exercise does not commend itself the book is not without its interest and value. We know far too little of a self-revealing God "Who is Love, not logic," and who will speak to the soul that is stilled and expectant before Him. The whole subject is one that is justly receiving renewed attention in these days, and Dr. Addison has made a worthy contribution to the increasing literature bearing upon it.

The Place of Women in the Church.

By three clergymen and five laywomen of the Church of England. Published in U. S. A. by the Young Churchman Company (now the Morehouse Company), Milwaukee, Wis. Pp. 204. $1.15.

Women and Church Work. By three clergymen and several laymen and laywomen of the Church of England. Edited by the Rev. Cyril C. B. Bardsley. Longmans, Green & Company, London and New York. Pp. 116. $1.00.

It is quite the fashion now, in England especially, for a number of authors to collaborate in producing works of this character. From the fact of these two books coming from the press at about the same time, from the pens of fifteen writers and abounding in quotations from contemporary authorities, we judge that "the Woman's Movement" is threatening to invade the English Church with larger demands than with us, or else that there women have not heretofore been so promi-nently engaged in practical Church work as in America and the brethren are a little disturbed at their increasing activities. Probably both are true.

In "The Place of Women in the Church" the question indicated is gravely discussed from the "Catholic" standpoint, with free use of precedents and decisions drawn from Italy and Asia Minor and musty with antiquity, as though they were fully applicable to present day conditions. At least two chapters and the Appendix are devoted to a discussion of Women and the "Priesthood." The Medical Ministry is viewed much more favorably, and the "Religious" life is strongly commended.

The second work mentioned, "Women and Church Work," seems to us far more practical, dealing with the subject with more sympathy and less timidity. But even this contains little of value that our good women over here have not long since claimed or discovered for themselves with the full approval and connivance of the ecclesiastical fathers and brethren.

Studies and Discussions for the Women's Fellowship and Reformed Mothers' Meetings. By Elma Paget Longmans, Green & Company. Pp. 95. Paper, sixty cents.

The methods followed, and some of the studies and discussions, could be used to advantage among us, and leaders of mothers' meetings will find here many hints that would make their work more useful as well as interesting.

Letters to the Editor

In this department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

EDUCATION.

Mr. Editor: In his book, "The Way of All Flesh," Butler uses this expression, "These Church-goers would be equally shocked if any doubted Christianity or if any one practiced it." In our Church papers much has been said upon the subject of religious education. Recently your paper had an article bristling with dangerous statements collected from the sayings of professors in our secular schools of higher education. In our churches and at our conventions I have heard religious education presented to the disparagement of all other schools and universities. Without intending the least reflection upon the good men engaged in work in the Church schools, but simply as a matter of principle, I think that it is regrettable that we should condemn, but do not help, our public schools and universities. I have known men who had been to the State universities and the professors in them, to feel very keenly the inferences which are so often drawn against them when this matter of education is presented. The plain purport of it was that they were failing in the mission of education, while the Church schools and universities were all perfection. I say that I regard this as unfortunate. For atter all, the great body of our people must and will receive such education as they get from these State institutions, and if matters there are not what they should be, it may be very largely our fault. It does seem to me that we take very little interest in these public channels of education, and it may be that we interest ourselves too much to keep up a tug between them and our religious colleges and schools. I know that religious leaders have banded themselves together and appeared before the Legislature to try to choke off the much-needed appropriations for State universities, because their schools were in competition with them. Christianity is supposed to concern itself with the common man. I use "common" in the sense of every day, usual man. "You shall love your neighbor as yourself," means that you do not wish any privilege which cannot be shared by all. And yet these public institutions, which will increasingly be the common man's school, do not interest us, and are too often condemned by us.

Again, these public men very reasonably reply, it seems to me that religious education has not been the boon which we are inclined to picture it to have been. The universities of this country in the early days when almost exclusively in the hands of religious leaders were not nearly so efficient nor of so high a moral tone as they are now, when the great body of the professors are taken from civil life. At William and Mary College I have read, in the days of Bishop Madison, the Lord's Supper was parodied. Such a thing now under Dr. Lyon G. Tyler would be inconceivable. The professors of these universities I meet impress me as being men of singular high character. If in the vast body of them a vagary can here and there be pointed out, I feel that it is incontrovertable, that the faculties of these institutions in moral character will compare favorably with our own body of ministers, and they are quite as unselfish and self-sacrificing. These public institutions should receive our solicitude and aid. If I had my way—and it is perhaps fortunate that I do not have it—I would ask the President of the State University to attend our Church convention for an address, that it might be known we sincerely wish to keep in touch with his work. These men would appreciate such an attitude, and I am certain are most anxious to maintain a high moral order in their schools. We cannot complain of anything, if the insistence upon our part is going to be exclusively upon our own denominational schools and universities. As I have said, I think we have little to complain of. We simply need to show our interest in public schools and State universities. A dozen of the best men taken from the university of this State will be the equal of a like number taken from any religious institution we have. Our attitude tends to weaken our concern for the schools of the common man, and his interest in us.

You may have noticed that the Labor Party of England has given out a program recently of what it proposes to stand for. We are told that this party is in majority over there, and will doubtless in the near future take matters in hand. That program included a very severe dealing with religious schools. One of its leaders said in a widely read book, "Why Men Fight," that it was claimed that these religious schools gave "a spirit"; that he had heard of the "Eton spirit," "the Rugby spirit," etc., and that it was generally the spirit of the snob. This may not be true, but it is unfortunate that we should talk so much of wishing to help the common man, and take so very little interest in what most concerns him. I know that it is very appealing to dangle with the idea of sending one's son off to some university where, in peculiar circumstances, he will not come in contact with the rough fellows of the world, and maybe he will get "a spirit," but it none the less occurs to me that Christians should be found where their central doctrine is being worked out—where all men are brothers. I should be able to send my sons to the places where the average man must go—the public schools and universities, and with the hope that Christians, because of the very function which such institutions play, would make those places the matter of their deepest interest. For myself, I ask no especial favor in the name of Christianity, and I do not wish to do one thing which will sever such little influence as I may have from the usual sources of education. There may be risk in this. But if there is, it is the sort of risk that Christians should welcome, and seek to ameliorate.

The future is going to be in the hands of the public schools and State universities. We fight against destiny when we go against them. We can render them great service if we care to. Or we can leave them to struggle on without us, thereby emphasizing our small concern for public matters, and may be, delaying for a while that popular endorsement which in the end will be theirs. I read once a principle which ran something like this, "You should do nothing yourself, which you did not believe every other man should do." If every man sends his boys to religious schools, we will disrupt public education. If we give it our most hearty endorsement, which it richly merits, we can do a great Christian service—one of the greatest I can conceive of.

OUR THEOLOGICAL FACULTIES.

Mr. Editor: Among the statements made by a committee of the convention of one of our leading dioceses in the East is this, in substance: "The instructors in our theological seminaries may expect to face empty benches." This statement deserves, in my judgment, more than a casual reading. Beginning with Virginia and going North, we find in four seminaries not less than thirty-five clergymen engaged in instructing a few students. I have not the number—but there are the "empty" seats.

The question arises, Is not the Church maintaining, for the time at least, too many seminaries? Is this conservation? I recognize that there are obstacles connected with reducing the number, even ad interim. If these are insuperable, is there another solution? I have this suggestion to offer: Cannot the faculties of all of our seminaries be reduced in number? The percentage of professors to students appears to me out of all reason. Institute a comparison between the numbers to whom rectors administer efficiently and the students to whom our professors minister. The professors' year is nine months—or less; the rectors' is eleven months—or more.

Another question, please: Is the time of our professors so fully occupied, or their strength so fully taxed, that it would be unreasonable to ask them to undertake the additional work made necessary by a reduction in the numerical strength of the faculties?

I hope that these thoughts will not be viewed as those of a cynic. The Church, no less than the nation, should conserve her resources of every kind. Her leaders should be patriots and philosophers. Our professors are men exceptionally equipped, and should be wisely used. Conservation is our watch-word: are we consistently practicing it?

LETTER OF DRS. SMYTH AND WALKER TO BISHOP GAILOR.

The Rt. Rev. Bishop T. F. Gailor, D. D.,
Chairman of the House of Bishops.

Dear Bishop Gailor:

We would acknowledge the receipt of your kind answer to our inquiry whether a special committee of conference might be appointed by Bishop Tuttle, the Presiding Bishop, and yourself as Chairman of the House of Bishops. You reply, "To this request I am reluctantly compelled to answer no." As we likewise must reluctantly accept this inability of the Bishops to give serious consideration to our overtures for some act of unity, allow us to submit in closing this correspondence the following brief statement of our own position.

1. While the House of Bishops was in session we expressed our readiness to confer with any of the Bishops at any hour should they desire us to do so. We have since been informed that lack of time prevented them from accepting this offer.

2. Subsequently the suggestion of some possible conference having been made to us by the Chairman of your Commission on Unity, we submitted it with our reply to the Presiding Bishop, who referred it to you. Our position we stated in a letter to you as follows: "Since the House of Bishops has closed the door to any overtures from us, our attitude must be simply one of readiness to respond to any further proposals that may be made to us. Allow us, however, to assure you that, should you with the Presiding Bishop deem it desirable to do so, we on our part would at once accept as sufficiently authorized officially any persons you might name as entrusted with the conduct of such a conference." We further suggested that a small committee might be desirable composed of men of strength and vision.

3. In your answer you gave as a reason for the declination of our offer that "neither the Presiding Bishop nor the Chairman has authority to appoint any such committee; the only body that might deal with this subject between meetings of the General Convention is the Standing Commission on Christian Unity."

4. As this reason was not given in the report presented by the Bishop of Vermont and adopted by the House of Bishops, we would call attention to a point in our communication which seems to have been overlooked in your answer. We addressed the Bishops on their own theories of the Episcopate, waiving for the end in view our own opinions, and resting our appeal for unity on the basis of the Historic Episcopate according to the offer of the Lambeth Quadrilateral. We did not then, and we do not now address the Bishops as Diocesan officials of that branch of the Church known as the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, but as a portion of a universal Episcopate. We are further justified in so doing inasmuch as this distinction is clearly and absolutely made in the Rules of the House of Bishops (Section 21-23). It is therein provided that the House at any session may resolve itself into a "Council of Bishops," and that the "body known as an assembly of Catholic Bishops, considering and acting upon matters of duty or responsibility resting on them as a portion of the universal Episcopate" may make declarations or recommendations; and such responsibility and action is there distinguished from "the House of Bishops in its constitutional and canonical capacity."

In this larger and higher responsibility as a portion of the universal Episcopate we had ventured to ask the Bishops to sound some note of leadership in the present emergency which other communions might gladly follow. We can now only express our regret that in your view of the limited authority of the American Episcopal office, you find yourself unable to enter into the desired conferences at present with other communions. Our regret is the greater because, since the beginning of the war, the Archbishops' Commission in England has been and is now conducting conferences with representatives of the Nonconformist churches there with gratifying and promising results.

While we are obliged to act in accordance with the terms of the official resolutions of the House of Bishops, we desire to express our appreciation of your words of personal esteem and your explanations of the intention of the Bishops. Representing our own communion, and in accordance with its historic position as claiming to be but one part of the whole Church, we would seek so to act in relation to your and to other communions that by our attitude no other part of the Church may be compelled to remain in separation from the whole Church. We, therefore, leave our proposals for action with the will for unity, as a standing offer of conciliation on our part, and we shall gladly welcome at any time other overtures, should they be made.

With high esteem, sincerely yours,
Newman Smyth,
Williston Walker.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

V. The Root of Present Difficulties.

When there are large numbers of clergy not suitably employed; when there are pitiful appeals from married clergymen for such work as will enable them to properly maintain their families; and when, on the other hand, there are large numbers of vacant churches, when missionary work lags, and Bishops are making frantic appeals for help, it seems plain that there must be something wrong somewhere. What is the root of present difficulties? Where does the trouble lie?

The Bishop of Massachusetts eight years ago said to his diocesan convention: "The traditions of the Church in the State were strongly congregational." Each parish "had been responsible for the salary of its minister, and had felt no further responsibility for the support of the clergy, except on the ground of charity." The tendency of this spirit that prevailed was to make the Diocese "a congeries of independent churches." As he further said: "The Bishop, do what he could, was unable to interest the members in the missions and other work of the Diocese, for each section, parish and mission knew but little of the others." This spirit of selfish independency defeats the missionary work of the Church and is very harmful. As the Missionary Bishop of North Texas has said: "Next to total indifference, the greatest drawback to our obtaining the one great and only object of our existence is parochialism, or local selfish interests."

As a form of Church government, congregational independency seems to have arisen in England three hundred years ago. It was brought to America. The theory of independent Church government has spread widely in this land. The taint of congregational independency has affected our own Church. What the Bishop of Massachusetts has said is true elsewhere, traditions "were strongly congregational."

According to this congregational independent system, each parish extends a "call" to a clergyman to become their pastor. The people of the parish pay his salary, as they would pay any other man employed by them; and then also, if they see fit, dismiss him, as they would dismiss any hireling. It follows also, according to this system, that a clergyman should "preach on trial," for this custom is right and proper, according to this system.

With us the custom of "preaching on trial" has produced disgust; but we have not got rid of the taint of congregational independency. Take the small and weak parish. It cannot pay a proper salary to its rector. The reasons that arise are many. Some things cannot be helped, as the death or removal of the best paying members of the parish lessens the income of the parish. Other reasons may be weak, foolish or wrong. The rector cannot help it; the vestry notify him that they cannot pay the promised salary, and suggest his resignation. He is not to blame, but what shall he do? Certainly he ought not to go around "preaching on trial."

As the Living Church Annual for 1916 has said: "If a clergyman is out of work, or if he has work that is not adapted to him and he ought to leave, what is he to do? He applies to his Bishop, who probably has the right of nomination only to difficult mission posts," and there are often many reasons why a married clergyman especially cannot accept such places.

From these observations certain conclusions may be drawn. On the one hand, taking the Church in this land, as a whole, "the churches are not impoverished." There are strong parishes that selfishly spend money on what seem to others as parish luxuries. Too small a proportion of their gifts go toward any fund for support of clergy. The independent parish spends its money on itself.

The small and weak parish, on the other hand, cannot fulfill the obligations which its "call" implies. Large numbers of clergy are thrown on the "non-parochial list."

The "taint of congregational independency" is at the root of our difficulties. Small and weak parishes ought not to have the power to extend a "call" to a clergyman to become their rector when they cannot support him; and also they ought not to have the power to dismiss a rector at their will. There are other ways in which these matters should be arranged.

It may be added that this taint of congregational independency affects many mission stations which do not have a parish organization, and this selfish independent spirit often thwarts a Bishop in his efforts.

It is right that our lay people should have a voice in Church matters. They should be interested, and should be consulted. On the other hand, Bishops are given authority, in order that they may govern. And Bishops should govern, not with autocratic power, but according to principles generally accepted in our nation.

It is a divine obligation that gifts of God's people should be made for support of clergy. It is the suggestion of the writer that some greater power (not autocratic) might be placed in the hands of our Bishops in the use and distribution of such funds and in the appointment of clergy for their work. Missionary Boards (composed of both clergy and laity), wardens and vestrymen, and mission committees should all be advisory helpers. To get out of present difficulties, we need a better system. There should be neither a "death of clergy" nor, on the other hand, a long list of parochial clergy, who cannot get suitable employment.

The Great Commission

The Treasury.

Mr. King's monthly report, as of July 1, shows total receipts to date of $793,476.26—a continued falling off.

Parish offerings are behind, $62,364.88; Sunday-school gifts are behind, $441.65; Womans' Auxiliary gifts are behind, $7,035.42; Junior Auxiliary offerings are behind, $5,116.75. Total decreases, $74,958.70. While individual gifts are ahead, $8,170.32; making a net decrease of, $66,788.38.

This Is the Financial Story.

One thought only. Many parishes have granted their rectors leave of absence, and they are now ministering to the army in camp at home and overseas. Because of this we who cannot go have been given an extra duty. There is the national duty which calls for our service in a thousand ways undreamed of a few months ago. And there is the spiritual duty which tells us there must be no halting in the Master's work. The national army has largely been conscripted, and the country thrills with the doings of our boys. The spiritual army has been signed with the sign of His Cross. Together these two great forces must go forward to battle, bearing His banner between them. This is the only way to win God's victory and peace. Oh, help us not to fail!

GEORGE GORDON KING,
Treasurer.

After Five Months.

Mrs. Julia C. Emery.

On January 17 our first missionaries to the Dominican Republic, the Rev. and Mrs. William Wylie, arrived in the city of Santo Domingo. On the 19th of June Mrs. Wylie writes of their first five months:

"Our initiation into this one hundred years or more behind the time country was an experience not soon to be forgotten. Everywhere was a sea of black faces, and the jabbering of Spanish at a terrible rate to one not comprehending it was bewildering. The primitive country and manners of the natives seemed so unreal. One felt by rubbing the eyes one might waken from a dream. The stern reality of things confronts one everywhere. The nakedness and ignorance of many of the natives, and especially of the country folk are astonishing. One almost forgets the beauty of land and sea coast, mountains and valley, through the great crying need of missions and schools. Truly a great opportunity for the Church is near at hand and a country ready and eager for instruction.

"Looking around there seemed so much to do, that effort seemed impossible. There is no Protestant church building in the city. However, Mr. Wylie found a number of Americans and English-speaking whites, and since our first Sunday we have held regular services at seven and ten A. M., with an attendance of from ten to forty persons.

A guild called the Epiphany Guild has been organized, and has about twenty-five members. Besides sewing and taking orders for home-made things, $175 has been raised by private subscription, and with this a piano for church services has been ordered from the States. On July 1st a gift shop will be opened whose proceeds are to be kept for a church building fund. A Junior Auxiliary has been formed. It has eight members, and during Lent they prepared to give "The Children's Crusade." There were twenty-four children taking part in this, and it was given in Easter week, as an outdoor pageant. It was a great success and netted us twenty-one dollars, the first gift to the Board of Missions from our children.

Meditation is one way of handling the Gospel History. Instead of a vague, half-remembered, less than half-comprehended, story, the life of Jesus, steadily meditated on, passes into the life of the Christian, by an insensible but real transfusion.—Rev. H. P. Liddon, D. D.

"There is a small branch of the Woman's Auxiliary—only five members—but as time goes on interest and membership may increase. Mr. Wyllie has conducted a study class on Missions. Mrs. Colmore has been asked to send fifty United Thank Offering boxes, in the hope that they may soon be in all the homes of the congregation. A missionary quilt is being planned and perhaps it can be exhibited in Detroit next year, as also some of the native articles. The Juniors are already collecting photographs of the island for an album, which would be interesting, too. Besides the Auxiliary there is also a probationary class of the Daughters of the King. The Red Cross drive given here recently kept many of the workers busy in other than Church circles, but now that is over, we are getting back to steady work.

"Miss McCullough was with us for three months, teaching, and we realize more than ever the urgent need of two teachers for fall work. There were twenty-one pupils in the church, and we have promise of at least six more for September, if the Board of Missions can supply the teachers. Mr. Wyllie has already purchased twenty-five desks, and many other things will be needed for equipment.

"Then there are the colored people. They need a teacher speaking Spanish, who could instruct in English. An industrial school would be a wonderful thing here. But, alas! why go on wishing, for, I suppose, more than we can expect in many years to come! Both Mr. Wyllie and I are working very hard, and in many ways we see wonderful results, but we must have financial help from the Board of Missions to do the really great things so much needed.

"At San Isidro there is a flourishing little colored mission at which Mr. Wyllie has regular services twice a month. Later I hope to make a trip there to organize the women for work. On Sunday, June 23d, Mr. Wyllie will consecrate the Protestant cemetery there, and he has made arrangements to bury the dead in future in a decent Christian manner. He is constantly searching out new missions and working up Church people, many of whom have not received the Holy Communion for from ten to fifteen years!

"The urgency of this new work is apparent, for no less than four evangelists are touring the country since we came. We are first on the field, and we should try to keep first!"

Woman Helper Wanted.

In a letter recently received at the Missions House from the Rev. Lefford M. A. Haughwout, priest in charge of Holy Trinity Church, Ponce, Porto Rico, there is this paragraph.

"I feel the time has come when I must lose something of my inherent diffidence in speaking of my wants, for the work in which I am so deeply interested and for which I am devoting important years of my life is at a standstill because I cannot secure a satisfactory woman worker. There is no one to teach in the Sunday-school. . . . There is no one for the little children. . . . Since Easter we have had no music for church or Sunday-school for lack of an organist.

"In fact, the work is going back, and all that I have accomplished so far will be lost unless a competent helper is sent at once. It is absolutely essential that she be able to take charge of the music.

"I simply must have someone, even if it is necessary to put a full page advertisement in The Spirit of Missions. Nor shall I be happy if it takes another winter to get some one. She must be on the ground not later than November 1, and I want the very best there is—not a mere filler-in.

"The war has put new conceptions of efficiency into all of us, and we cannot be as tolerant of things as formerly. I don't believe our missionary 'administration' wants us to be. Won't you please do what you can to help?"

The Blue Ridge Missionary Conference. An Unusual Gathering.

The Blue Ridge Conference for 1918 is just over. Many had looked forward with keen interest, wondering what effect this second year of the war would have upon it. It was different from all preceding conferences. For the second time in the history of Blue Ridge our delegation was the largest, drawn from eight Dioceses, and better still, it was a delegation of more than usual possibilities. Seventeen were young enough for work in the mission fields abroad. Two were volunteers and three others came away seriously considering the question.

Dr. W. C. Sturgis prepared the conference each day for the work ahead with an early intercessory service, using an arrangement of prayers and Bible readings of his own. These booklets were in the hands of all who wanted them and the prayers were from this book in one's own words as each person present preferred. Dr. Sturgis also led a series of fine conferences on the war plan.

The addresses of special interest were by Dr. Sturgis on Prayer; Dr. R. W. Patton, Bishop Horner, the Governor of North Carolina, Rev. Mr. Derbyshire, of the American Expeditionary Forces, and Rev. Dr. Brown, of the Philippine Islands. Dr. Patton's subject was the Nation and the Negro. He said the United States Department of Education is "literally begging the churches to give four times as much as they are now giving to train Christian leaders for the negro race." Later, Dr. Patton made a definite plan for enlisting the interest of the Churchwomen of the Fourth Province in this plea of the Commissioner of Education.

The classes attracting most of our people were the two-hour normal class with practice teaching which was skillfully led by Miss Bertha Richards, of our own Communion, a one-hour normal class in methods by Dr. H. H. Hogue, of New York University, the Missionary Education of Children by Mrs. E. C. Cronk, who is rapidly becoming known all over the country largely because of this August class at Blue Ridge and "The Negro in the South," led by Dr. Archibald Trawick.

Last year the first day's enrollment for this subject was five—this year, thirty!

Comparing this conference with former ones—the presence of two hundred men in khaki, training for Y. M. C. A. service, made the greatest difference. It brought the war very near home. Then the large number of young, very young, women—among them ten girls from St. Mary's School, Raleigh, chaperoned by Mrs. T. W.

Bickett, the wife of North Carolina's Governor—made a difference. These two groups created a wholesome atmosphere. And the older leaders and delegates, too, as well as the younger ones, seemed to have risen above the stress of the times and to have made literally true what more than once was said about this conference this year: "I never saw so many happy people." On the other hand, it was impossible on account of war conditions to get all the leaders needed and because some of the small number who did come had to be shared with other conferences, the last two days fell far short of what they might have been.

The evening before adjournment our delegation declared they had found at Blue Ridge: The Spirit of Christ, understanding, brotherhood, charity, happiness, helpfulness, a broadening vision of power, the spirit of prayer, training in prayer and training in missionary education.

And Dr. Sturgis had thrilled those who heard his talk on the M. E. M. when he said until this conference he had not believed Church unity a possibility. If all this is true what must we do about it?

The kinds of people to be sent next year was seriously discussed in our last group meeting:

1. Sunday-school superintendents.
2. Educational secretaries.
3. Younger people.
4. And by all means those with qualifications for leadership.

These were said to be the ones who, when trained, would be of most value to the Church. And what are the most worth while things for those sent to do? Specialization was urged as never before. Leader after leader recommended the two-hour normal class as the chief thing—perhaps the one thing—many should do next year. And from present indications three, perhaps four, of these two-hour normal classes with practice teaching, led by the best leaders the whole country affords, will be provided for the conference of 1919.

Looking back over the whole, the spirit was very wonderful, some good work was done, but better still, greater desire than ever before was expressed for such training as this conference has only had in small measure up to the present time. And it was no small thing for a conference to have "captured the imagination" of some of the leaders in the largest Church school in America. And other things, far-reaching, perhaps, were set in motion, but what impresses most—and impresses profoundly—about the Blue Ridge Conference are the possibilities bound up in it, and as yet are only just beginning to be laid hold of for the hastening of the coming of the kingdom of God.

Church Intelligence

Missionary Education Conference at Silver Bay, New York.

The seventeenth annual conference of the Missionary Education Movement just closed at Silver Bay, Lake George, New York, was one of the most successful in its history. Two hundred and ninety-two delegates were present from seventy cities and towns, including one group of twenty-five Episcopalians from Richmond, Va. The largest delegations were as follows: Presbyterians, 93; Episcopalians, 44; Congregational, 60; Baptist, 30; Methodist, 21.

The keynote of the conference was the Church's duty in war-time and of preparedness for the work of reconstruction. Over thirty classes met every morning during the ten days of the conference and sought the Christian solution for the social and economic problems of the present and future.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Franklin County: St. Peter's in the Mountains was the place of a most interesting service Sunday, July 14th, when St. Phoebe's Hall was dedicated to the glory of God and for the education of mountain children.

The Rev. W. T. Roberts, rector of this parish, has for a number of years labored with great zeal among the mountain people, first building a chapel then a modest schoolhouse afterwards and a teachers' home, from which has radiated a large influence over that section of the Blue Ridge Mountains.

The schoolhouse was inadequate and certain Roanoke people became interested, notably Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Needles, and they decided to build an adequate schoolhouse in memory of their little girl, "Phoebe," who departed this life a few years ago, hence the new St. Phoebe Hall, which will stand as a memorial to a sweet child and for perpetual benefit to the children of the mountains.

Bishop Tucker had charge of the services which consisted of a special form for such occasions. The Bishop made a most inspiring address, which was enjoyed by a great throng of people who deeply appreciate what is being done for them.

Greensville County: The work of the two Greenville parishes is progressing under the new rector, Rev. Norman F. Marshall. He is expressing himself as hopeful and much pleased to be back in his native State again. At Emporia the rectory has been thoroughly renovated on the interior; in Meherrin parish the rectory (now rented out) has been painted outside. The Sunday-schools of the two churches (Grace and Christ) are conducting a Teacher Training Class jointly, under Mrs. Marshall. This involves a ten-mile ride for some of the teachers. Mr. Marshall has been invited and expects to address the district Teachers' Institute (interdenominational) in August on the Necessity for Teacher Training Classes. For the sake of accuracy it may be said that Mr. Marshall has never served the Church in Florida at all. He has served in Virginia, West Virginia, Ohio, New Mexico and Texas. He went from Bramwell, W. Va., to Carlsbad, N. M.

WEST VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. W. L. Gravatt, D. D., Bishop.

Open Air Services, Wheeling: The outdoor services in connection with St. Matthew's Church, Rev. R. E. L. Strider, rector, have been very successful this summer. The rector, as he did last year, secured permission from the city authorities to set apart a portion of the street between the church and city buildings opposite, and here on Sunday evenings an interested and interesting congregation gathers, some of whom look forward to the service, while others are passersby who have been attracted by the unusual service. Several of the ministers from other churches have been present this summer, and have delivered the address. The last service for this summer will be held on Sunday evening, July 28. Some who have been regular attendants regret that the services are to be discontinued for the present; they have been satisfactory in every way.

The Woman's Prayer Battalion: The South Wheeling Branch of the Woman's Prayer Battalion meets in the Third Presbyterian Church on each Wednesday evening, and some of the ladies of St. Andrew's Church, the Rev. James L. Fish, rector, are among the most regular at the service. Each family represented, if one from which a soldier has gone into the service of his country, is supplied with a small white cross which is designed to be affixed to the service flag in that home. This is a silent reminder to the passerby, who may be in the secret, that she is expected to offer up a silent prayer for the absent one.

St. Matthew's Mission, Chester: This mission is at present without a rector, and is much in need of some one to look after the services which for the present have been discontinued.

Meeting of Farnham Church Restoration Association.

The annual meeting of the Restoration Association of Old Farnham Church at Farnham in Richmond County was held on Sunday, July 14, with an all-day meeting, and services morning, afternoon and evening. After a picnic dinner under the trees in the churchyard, the business meeting of the Association was held, the Rev. Frederick D. Goodwin, rector of the parish being elected President; Mr. W. Gray Brockenbrough, of Emmerton, Treasurer, and Mrs. Addie Veazey Payne, of Farnham, Secretary. It was reported that about $700.00 was in hand toward the restoration of the old church, and a building committee was appointed to proceed at once with the work of restoration, as far as the money in hand, and that which can be secured at this time, will permit. The services of the day were conducted by the rector of the parish, assisted by the Rev. G. M. Brydon, rector of St. Mark's Church, Richmond, who made the address in the morning and preached in the afternoon and evening.

Old Farnham Church was built before 1737. It suffered the fate of abandonment after the Revolution, as did so many of our churches of that period. It was used at one time for a barn, at another for a distillery. It was in the midst of a hot fight between local militia and the soldiers of the British expedition which burned Washington in the War of 1812, and still shows the marks of bullets which struck the walls. It was restored and in use for services when, during the War Between the States, it was again wrecked, and soldiers camped within its walls. After another restoration the church was used until 1888, when a fire, which destroyed half the village, burned out the interior of the building. After that final catastrophe, the congregation erected another church at Emmerton, three miles distant, leaving the massive walls of the old building still standing. The walls are intact, after thirty years of neglect, and with some strengthening of foundations and of the top courses can be made strong enough to last for generations to come.

It is the purpose of the Restoration Association to put the walls into perfect repair at once, and, if the funds will permit, to put a concrete floor throughout the building, and erect the roof, after which windows and doors and interior furnishings will be added as soon as possible. A congregation of worshippers is already being gathered in the village. An abandoned chapel was purchased several years ago, and moved into Farnham churchyard, where it is used regularly for Sunday-school and services. And as there is no other place of worship within three miles, the people of the community, irrespective of denomination, are eagerly anxious for the restoration of the old historic building.

Bishop's Visitation to a New Colored Mission.

On Friday, July 19, Bishop Brown visited St. Matthew's Mission, Alps, in Caroline County, and St. Mark's Mission at Beazley, in Essex County, both mission points in the field of the Rev. John H. Scott, of Essex County. At both of these places the services were held in the open air; at Alps, under an arbor erected on what is hoped to be the site of a future chapel and school building, the Bishop, the Archdeacon and the rector vesting in the open air, behind the screen of bushes which forms the back of the arbor; and at Beazley upon the front porch of a private house, where the sacrament of Baptism was administered, and fourteen adults kneeled before the Bishop to receive the rite of Confirmation. At both places the colored people themselves have given the land, and are endeavoring to raise the money for the erection of buildings for school and church services. A parish school was established last year at Beazley, and the Archdeacon of the Colored Work plans to establish another at Alps this year.

The people to whom the Rev. Mr. Scott ministers at these two mission points form an unusual community in the midst of the colored people of the adjacent country; owning their own land as independent farmers. They trace their ancestry directly to the Pamunkey Indians of the Pamunkey River Reservation, from which their fathers came, and in feature and coloring they show the characteristic Indian type. The fourteen confirmed at this visitation are the first fruits of Mr. Scott's work among them, as the mission was started just a year ago.

At St. Thomas' Church, Ginter Park, Richmond, on Sunday morning, July 21, the rector, the Rev. F. Ernest Warren, dedicated a handsome carved oak pulpit, the gift of Mr. William M. Archer in memory of his brother, Mr. Edward R. Archer. The pulpit was made by J. and R. Lamb, of New York, and adds greatly to the beauty and dignity of the chancel.

A campaign has been inaugurated to raise funds for the building of an enlarged parish house. The new building will have a gymnasium for the use of the younger members of the congregation and community, and it is also hoped that a swimming pool may be included. The keenest interest is being displayed by the congregation in the plan, and already more than $10,500 has been contributed and pledged. The money as collected will be invested in Liberty Bonds until such time as it may seem wise to start the construction of the building.

Although St. Thomas' is one of the youngest of the Richmond churches, it has now a membership of some hundred and twenty-five communicants, a Sunday-school enrollment of more than a hundred and fifty children, and is entirely free from debt, the church having been consecrated a short time ago. The rector and congregation are to be congratulated upon the splendid progress the work has made.

J. L. G.

The Rev. William R. Geiger Irwin has entered upon his duties as assistant minister in St. Andrew's Church, Richmond, and is in residence at 225 South Cherry Street. Rev. Mr. Irwin comes to Virginia from the Diocese of Maryland, where he was connected with St. John's and St. Peter's Churches, Ellicott City, Md.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Death of Miss Kerfoot: On July 10, the thirty-seventh anniversary of the death of her father, the late Rt. Rev. Dr. John Barrett Kerfoot, first Bishop of Pittsburgh, Miss Christiana Kerfoot entered into the rest of Paradise.

She was the last surviving member of a family of seven children. For more than a quarter of a century Miss Kerfoot served as Treasurer of the Diocesan Prayer Book Society and for a long period was parochial treasurer of the United Offering in the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, and was deeply interested in all missionary as well as parochial matters. Of late years her health has been far from robust, and during the last year she was compelled to give up all active participation in church work.

The funeral services were held on Friday afternoon, July 12, in the Church of the Ascension, under the charge of the Bishop of the Diocese, and interment was in Homewood Cemetery.

Death of Prominent Layman: Calvary Church, Pittsburgh, has met with a considerable loss in the death of one of its oldest communicants. Mr. Stephen Jarvis Adams, who entered into rest at his country home, Coraopolis Heights, on Friday, July 5, at the age of eighty-one. He was a descendant of the Massachusetts line of Adams. For two decades he served as vestryman and superintendent of the Sunday-school of Calvary parish. He is survived by his widow, three children and four grandchildren. The funeral took place from Calvary Church on Monday afternoon, the officiating clergymen being the Rev. Messrs. L. E. Whittemore, the Rev. D. L. Ferris, of Rochester, New York, and the Bishop.

Personar: During the absence of the Rev. Dr. Wyatt Brown, for his summer vacation, the Church of the Ascension is being cared for by the Rev. W. H. Anthony, of Pierre, South Dakota.

The Rev. R. A. Benton, of Norfolk, Va., rector emeritus of St. Stephen's Church, Sewickley, will officiate during the summer, the rector, the Rev. A. C. Howell, serving now in France as chaplain, and his supply being absent on a vacation.

EAST CAROLINA.

Rt. Rev. Thomas. C. Darst, D. D., Bishop

Christ Church, New Bern, the Rev. Daniel G. MacKinnon, rector. A service of intercession, designed especially, though not exclusively, for the children of the community, has been inaugurated by the rector. It will be held in the different churches of the town in rotation, every Friday afternoon, all the church bells as well as the courthouse bell ringing out the summons a quarter of an hour beforehand. Governor Bickett, Senator Simmons and Mayor Clark have written expressions of their hearty approval of the plan, and Bishop Darst has prepared suitable prayers for use by the children on these and similar occasions.

These services are additional to a daily service of intercession which Mr. MacKinnon has held for several months in Christ Church.

ALABAMA.

Rt. Rev. C. M. Beckwith, D. D., Bishop.

The Rev. James F. Plummer has resigned the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Mobile, to take active duty as Dean of the Convocation in caring for the missionary work within its limits which war conditions have made it difficult to provide with missionaries. Mobile and its environs has received a great influx of new population in connection with the shipbuilding plants that are being developed, and this will open a large new field for missionary enterprise. The Dean will continue to serve All Saints' Church as minister-in-charge until a new rector is chosen.

Personal Notes

The Rev. G. G. Bennett regretfully declined the election to the office of Suffragan-Bishop of the Diocese of Montana, which was tendered him at the recent Convention in Missoula, because of his strong objections to the office of Suffragan.

Bishop Perry, who is to take Bishop McCormick's place as representative of the War Commission of the Church, expects to sail shortly for France.

The Rev. Cuthbert W. Collorbon, of Sewanee, Tenn., has taken charge of Grace Church, Waycross, Ga., where he expects to remain during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Robert N. MacCallum, who is civilian chaplain at Camp Wheeler, Ga.

The Rev. Walter L. Laffin, rector of Trinity Church, Victoria, Texas, has resigned to accept a call to the Diocese of Atlanta.

The Rev. Millard W. Riker, of the staff of the Chapel of the Intercession, New York City, has accepted the rectorship of St. Paul's Church, Henderson, Ky., and expects to take charge at once.

Bishop Restarick, who has been granted a leave of absence by the Board of Missions in order to recover his full health and strength, is now in California, and writes that he is already wonderfully improved.

The Rev. William E. Rambo has been appointed special preacher at St. Paul's Cathedral, Marquette, and is in charge of the services for July.

The Rev. Arthur L. Charles, of Christ Church, Glen Ridge, N. J., has accepted a call to the Church of St. Mark, Eastern Parkway, Brooklyn, N. Y.

Ordinations.

In St. James Church, Keene, N. H., on Sunday, June 23, Bishop Parker ordained to the diaconate Mr. Whitney Hale, presented by the Rev. Dr. John S. Littell, who also preached the sermon.

On Sunday, June 30, in St. Luke's Church, Hot Springs, South Dakota.

Bishop Burleson ordained to the diaconate David William Clark. Mr. Clark will be stationed at Rapid City, South Dakota.

On May 29, in St. Thomas' Church, Homestead, Baltimore, Md., Bishop Murray ordained deacon Mr. Clarence E. Wolf, who was presented by the Rev. Charles E. Perkins, rector of the parish. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. E. T. Helfenstein.

At Mount Calvary Church, Baltimore, Md., on June 13, Bishop Murray advanced to the priesthood, the Rev. Wallace R. Everton, who was presented by the Rev. Dr. William A. McClenthen, rector of the parish. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Arthur W. Jenks, D. D., of the General Theological Seminary.

In the Cathedral of St. John, Quincy, Ill., on June 30, the Bishop of Quincy ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Robert Hall Atcheson, presented by the Rev. Dr. D. E. Johnstone, and ordained deacon Ira Chestnutt Young, M. D., presented by the Rev. J. Boyd Cox. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Dr. Johnstone.

In St. Mary's Church, South Manchester, Conn., on June 28, the Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Robert John Johnson, who was presented by the Rev. James Stuart Neill, rector. The sermon was preached by the Rev. John H. Jackson.

In the Chapel of St. Paul, St. Paul's School, Concord, N. H., on June 16, the Bishop of New Hampshire ordained to the priesthood the Rev. William B. Spofford, who was presented by the Rev. Howard F. Hill, D. D. The sermon was preached by Dean Ladd, of the Berkeley Divinity School.

Deaths.

The Rev. William T. Forsythe died at Southwest Harbor, Maine, on June 27, aged fifty-seven years. Mr. Forsythe had been in charge since 1914 of the Church of St. John the Divine, Southwest Harbor, St. Andrew's Church, Seal Cove, and St. Columba's Church, Gott's Island.

The Red Cross: I should like to pay a tribute, through the Church press, to the efficiency and devotion of the Red Cross workers in the field, and especially here to the untiring zeal of the doctors and the invincible spirit of the nurses.

A few nights ago I went up with two camions of doctors and nurses to the hospitals just back of the American sector in the great battle. In my camion were Miss Stimson, chief nurse of the A. R. C. (a fine Churchwoman), and twenty-one nurses. We had a long and difficult trip and we arrived at our destination in the midst of an air raid. But every one of the nurses was cheerful and composed, and within a short time nearly all of them went immediately on to night duty, relieving others who had been continuously on duty for several nights and days. The hospitals in that particular place had been dreadfully bombed the night before, but the nurses had displayed courage and competence absolutely beyond all praise. Along with the trained nurses are many volunteer and auxiliary nurses and they are making an equally wonderful showing. And how the wounded boys depend on them! It's like mothering a lot of children.—Bishop McCormack, in the Living Church.

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

THE GERMAN VIEW.

An Associated Press correspondent is responsible for the report of this conversation between a captured German officer and an Englishman:

"I do not wish to insult you," said the German, "but you English are well-intended fools. We who govern in Germany are not like you. We govern the fools; the fools govern you."

"Your principles are sweeping," replied the Briton. "To come down to practice, what have you to say about the guilt of beginning the war?"

"Guilt?" demanded the German; "it was a glory. I claim it for Germany."

"That is hardly your official view."

"The official view is for the fools."

"But you believe in the Prussian purpose behind all this?" asked the British officer.

"I do, as in nothing else," replied the German. "The Prussian purpose is God. There is no other. Prussia will rend the veil of the temple, but she will destroy to create. Against Prussian might the world as it exists to-day will fall in ruins, but Prussia will build a better and more virile world in its place. Strength only will survive. The life of men is naturally a fight. The strongest in force and cunning will live."

Back to the Flood.

"It will be going back to the flood," said the Briton.

"Prussia is the flood."

"And when the old world is drowned, virtue and all such weaknesses will go with it?"

"The old virtue was womanish," said the prisoner. "The new virtue is strength."

"In that blessed future will war reign triumphant?"

"Life is war—all of life that is healthy. Peace is only striving for mastery with other weapons. That is the law of nature."

"So everyone will fight till everyone is dead?"

"The weakest will go under first. They are the disease. The strongest will live; and after that the stronger and stronger, till there is perfect health."

"But it may be that Prussia will keep a few slaves?"

"Certainly," said the German. "Those who care not to fight that they may rule in their nature slaves."

"I had enough of it," the officer concluded. "It was nauseating. But the man was genuine in his beliefs and so obsessed by his elementary notion of virility that it was a waste of time to argue with him. His conceptions were quite definite, and not a doubt assailed him."

Readers may wonder why we consider such a clipping to be appropriate matter for the columns of a Church periodical.

The reason is that we feel so strongly that this war is a struggle between the powers of darkness and the forces of righteousness, that we feel it to be one of the first duties of every clergyman, who is not able to be serving with the army to keep up the morale at home.

In order to do this effectively we must thoroughly appreciate what it is that we are struggling to conquer.

It is not a nation that we are opposing, nor an army nor a government.

It is a viewpoint, an obsession, a belief that force is the supreme quality, that "strength only will survive," and that this one great attribute is entirely centered in the Germans, who alone possess it in sufficient quantity and quality to be of any importance in the world.

The war should continue until this doctrine is entirely obliterated. To accomplish the destruction of this theory may require the absolute annihilation of those who hold it, if so they must go, no matter what the carnage or sacrifice on our part.

No concessions of territory, no acceptance of any peace terms that may be offered by the present government of Germany will accomplish this. Such peace offers as will presently be made will be but plays for time, even should they include restoration of Belgium and the cession of Alsace-Lorraine. With her present hold on Russia, Germany would only use such a peace as a truce for preparation for the next struggle.

The only condition that will make the world safe for "peace on earth, good will toward men" is, either the utter defeat of the German armies in the field, or the overthrow of her present rulers from within.

In inspiring the people to a tireless, resistless effort to crush the German confidence in the power of might the Church need lose none of the Master's teachings of mercy, but must also spread the desire to feed what is left of her starving population after the victory is won.

THE WATCHWORD OF THE NEW AGE.

During the era that is passing the great incentive word was competition. In the age that is now opening the new power will be co-operation.

The following statement was made on the floor of the United States Senate by the Democratic leader in that body:

"I, sir, have been for a long time the advocate of the government ownership of the railroads, telegraphs and telephones, and every other agency necessary to the welfare of the government, and for the uses of government. I would that the people shall possess themselves of the people's property—highways and communications. As to mines, I say to the senator, I have long been an advocate of the government holding such property as coal, oil and minerals."

Government ownership of public utilities is one form of co-operation. One general in command of all the Allied armies is another form of expression of the same trend. Other examples would be given without number in this day of combinations.

Will the churches have the wisdom to see the significance and grasp the power of this mighty word, "co-operation"?

There are many signs which look as though they would. In numerous cities union services are being held, sometimes in the open air and sometimes in a rotation of churches. Not infrequently as many as ten different congregations will join in these united devotions.

Another welcome indication of the growth of this same spirit is found in a letter that was written a short time ago to the housing department of the United States government by the chairman of the committee appointed to represent his own church, to try to arrange for services at a government plant just established near one of our large cities. This letter reads as follows:

My Dear Sir:

I have been appointed chairman of a committee of the Episcopal ministers of _____ to keep in touch with the development now going on in the neighborhood of the government powder plant being established near this city, with a view to establishing services as soon as the plant is finished and employees of the plant settled in the neighborhood.

It is our desire to establish, not a denominational religious work at this war plant, but rather a community church and social center in which the different Protestant churches of _____ could unite to care for the spiritual welfare of the employees and other residents of the community.

We understand that the government intends to erect a large number of houses for the employees. I am writing to ask if, in its housing plan, the government would be willing to include and erect a building to be used for the purpose of community church and social center. If the government will erect this building, I am very sure that the ministers of _____ will be only too glad to undertake the work of establishing and continuing both church services and social center as long as may be necessary.

Will you let me know if it would be possible for such a building to be erected by the government among its employees' houses.

Very sincerely,

Rector St. Mark's Church.

The plan here suggested could be adopted in many small towns throughout the country.

In the Holy Trinity all the Three Persons have a distinct place in prayer. Faith in the Holy Spirit of intercession as praying in us is as indispensable as the faith in the Father and the Son. And it is only as we give ourselves to the Spirit living and praying in us, that the glory of the prayer-hearing Father and the ever-blessed and most effectual mediation of the Son can be known by us in their power.—Andrew Murray.

The key-thought of this Sunday is best expressed by the Collect: that we who cannot do anything that is good without God may by Him be enabled to live according to His will. The first lesson gives the Deuteronomic answer to the question, What is the will of God? By no means a superfluous question then and not at all a superfluous question now. This is the answer: "What doth the Lord require of thee but to fear the Lord thy God and to love and serve Him with all thy heart and soul?" With this may be compared the notable and epoch-making answer of the Prophet Micah to the same question, a passage which aroused the enthusiastic admiration of Professor Huxley (Micah 6:6-8). Moreover, this God is one that doth execute the judgment of the fatherless and widow and loveth the stranger.

Two motives are urged for obedience: Redemption (again we are reminded that redemption and salvation are not one and the same) and the blessings which follow upon obedience. They were also to pass on these laws of God and this obedience to their children after them. In the second lesson, St. James deals with the same theme—the will of God and the blessings of obedience. The will of God is a good will. Every good and perfect gift is from Him, and of His will He begat us with the word of truth. Christian obedience is the regenerate life. It is the obedience of freemen and not of slaves. Christianity, indeed, is "the perfect law of liberty." The blessedness which in the Old Testament is promised to the obedient nation is here conferred inwardly upon the obedient individual. Then, too, as in Deuteronomy, God's will reaches out to others through us. "Pure religion (the word which ordinarily meant "outward religious observance," going to church and the like) pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this: to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction and to keep oneself unspotted from the world."

The opening words of the first evening lesson may not be altogether intelligible to the man in the pew, but the general idea of the passage is clear enough. The suffering servant of Jehovah learns the truth of God from God Himself and is defended and blessed by God, in contrast with those who walk in the light of a fire kindled by their own self-will, as a result of which they will lie down in sorrow, "the Lord God hath given unto me the tongue of the learned that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary." This corresponds with what the Christ says in the second lesson in answer to the astonishment of the Jews, "How knoweth this man letters having never learned (having never been through the schools)?" "If any man wills to do God's will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God or whether I speak (merely) of myself." Compare Robertson's sermon: "Obedience the organ of spiritual knowledge." The selection closes with the promise of the Spirit to those who believe in Him as prayed for in the Collect.

The Sunday-School Teacher.

To punctuality the good teacher will add the quality of cheerfulness. The scholar comes and finds the punctual teacher in his place; so far, so good. But what does the punctual teacher look like? For punctuality has its besetting defects. It is sometimes a forbidding virtue, akin to primness, sister to severity.

The good teacher has a bright face. All good Christians are good-looking. The teacher who represents the Christian religion, ought of all people to have a cheerful countenance. That is a vital part of his instruction. St. Paul showed his profound knowledge of human nature when he enjoined those who show mercy to do it with cheerfulness. He knew very well how the long face, the sombre manner, the artificial pathos and piety of some benevolent persons spoil their gifts.

The natural man beholding such disciples says within himself: "From this religion, good Lord, deliver us." It is true that the warning, "Be not righteous overmuch," is written in the book of Ecclesiastes, which is not the best book in the Bible. If we take righteousness to mean simple interior goodness it is not possible to be righteous overmuch. Nobody can be too good. It is quite possible, however, to be righteous overmuch in the matter of expression. There is an oppressive goodness which defeats its own purposes.

The lasting lesson is taught by the personality of the teacher. The words are forgotten, but the face is remembered and the teacher's face and manner proclaim the results of religion. What will religion do for us? What sort of persons will it make of us? These questions unexpressed are in the hearts of the scholars. If they see that religion makes the teacher pessimistic, nervous, narrow-minded, cross and complaining, they will be prejudiced against it. You may teach the creed of Christians' satisfaction, you may sing the songs of everlasting salvation, but all will be of none effect unless you yourself, are honestly happy, hopeful, merry and joyful. The preacher in the pulpit is impeded by a general disapprobation of humor. There is no such impediment in the Sunday-school. The lesson begins well when the teacher and the scholars laugh together.—Dean Hodges.

I never see a soldier lad,
His slim young figure closely clad
In belted tan, his shoulders straight,
His clear eyes earnest and elate,
But what the woman heart of me
Is filled with proud humility,
But what an inner whisper says:
'Lo, in these dark, tumultuous days,
That boyish body stands between Thyself and terror unforeseen—
The sword of Might swift conquering
Each tender, ancient, holy thing,
The powers of darkness running free
In old sweet lanes of liberty.
Between thee and disaster stands
The fending strength of those young hands,
Between thy spirit and despair
Those steadfast eyes keep watch, aware;
Between thyself and very death
Burns the quick flame of that young breath!"

Only a few brief years ago
His mother, with a broken word
Of rapture, leant above him low,
Her man child, gotten from the Lord;
Remembering not her agony,
Knowing alone that from the sea
Of storm and pain and mortal strife
She had made port with a new Life.

Therefore, to-day, with his heart's blood
He pays his debt to womanhood.
From youth, from play, from eager schemes,
From half acknowledged wistful dreams,
From home and love—from his young All,
Suddenly, at a bugle call,
He turns, alert, in a red dawn
And girds his strange new armor on.
For her sweet sake and for all Right
He makes him ready for the fight,
Poised like an arrow to be gone.

So, when I meet a marching boy,
Tawny and tall, my heart must beat
With more than pride of sturdy feet,
Of passionate drum, of flag unfurled—
My joy is as a mother's joy—
A man is born into the world!

"Putting It Over."

"I am sorry about him," said Mr. Allen. "He was too clever a boy to turn out as he did."

"Yes, it's too bad; but as to his cleverness, I don't agree with you," said Mr. Smith. "He had certain ability to get the best end of a bargain, and yet make it appear an honest transaction. He was an expert at 'putting it over,' as the boys say."

"You remember the days when we traded marbles? He would come to school with a pocketful of cheap, chipped-off marbles, but before noon he would have them all traded off for perfect ones. The boys could not tell how it was done, but he could make them think it was all right."

"There was something mysterious about his examination papers. The teacher knew they were not the result of his study. She felt sure there was something dishonest about them, but she couldn't find out what. He was never caught in any school scrapes; it was always the other fellow who got caught and punished. He certainly knew how to put it over the rest of us in school."

"Later, when he became a clerk in the grocery store, he was very successful in disposing of stale goods. He will fill orders with wilted celery and wormy raisins, and there was nothing to throw away on Monday morning."

"On account of his shrewdness, folks predicted that he had a great future before him, and he became rather conceited. So he went further, and began to practise little dishonesties with money, giving short change to customers who did not bother to count it. Of course, there was another step just ahead—he tampered with the money-drawer. He took just a little at first, but gained confidence when he was not found out, and kept at it. He must have better clothes; he must spend money more freely; he must keep a little ahead of the other fellows. By that time he had a bold belief that he could keep on putting it over every one."

"He tried it once too often. We say it was the 'last time' that put him in the penitentiary. But I am inclined to think it was the first time; that he started in that direction during the marble-trading days back in the school-yard, when he gloried in his ability to put it over his playmates."

"We sometimes like to jump the hard places, to cut across the fields, and we think that we are making headway swiftly; but the long cobblestone road of strict honesty will bring us, in the long run, to a safer landing place."—Exchange.

War Work and Mother.

"War work! Mother! Oh, no, we shouldn't allow it for a minute. She wanted to go to the Kensington Depot, but Gladys and I were very firm. She isn't really a bit strong."

"She always looks frail; but then she always did," the Colonel said, "even thirty years ago. She has a fine spirit."

"Spirit—or, yes, of course," said Doreen; "but it's her age that tells. This is the day of the young, isn't it? Every one says so. Why, Gladys and I get up at six."

The Colonel shuddered.

"I hope you don't bathe in the Serpentine," he said. "How on earth you manage to wake puzzles me."

"Mother wakes us," said Doreen, smiling. "She is so much better than an alarm. We tried it for a week, but we never heard it go off. Gladys tied it to her ear at last—I wouldn't—and she said she just dreamed that a motor was buzzing outside the door, and she went off again and slept till nine."

"And does your mother tie the clock to her ear?" he asked with interest.

"Oh, no. She says elderly people wake more easily, especially when they have something on their minds. It isn't a bit difficult to her."

"But cold?" he suggested.

"Oh, poor mother!—yes, until she has got us out of our beds and made our tea. That warms her up a bit. She doesn't swim in the Serpentine, either. She stokes up the fire and has a hot bath, I think, and breakfast at eight. Luxurious, I call it."

"You are lucky to have a maid to get breakfast at all," he said.

"Well, we haven't always," said Doreen, with a cheerful laugh. "Last week our Mrs. Smith was ill, and was away for six days, so mother cooked. She's an awfully good cook, which is so lucky; it makes the rations taste like the Ritz. At any rate, she didn't suffer from cold that week—at least, only in patches, when the gas-fire wouldn't work, and the gas company said the gas was being used for high-explosives. It's such an unanswerable excuse, isn't it?"

"And who does the catering? That's rather a business nowadays."

"The catering? Why, mother, of course." Doreen looked at him in genuine surprise. "She often has to stand in a queue now. Yesterday she was an hour and a quarter getting half a pound of margarine—lots of people pushed past her and got in first. She isn't a pugilist. And then she dropped it, and some one else picked it up and carried it off. Gladys and I couldn't spare the time. How could we? We get up at six, and we're fairly done when we get back at two o'clock. Pantry-maiding is pretty hard work, and besides it's monotonous—grinding. If we are not quite exhausted we squeeze in a matinee every now and then—one does want a change of ideas—otherwise we just tumble into bed till five. Mother always gets tea for us at five, and then Doreen and I go out and shop, and get a change of ideas."

"And your mother?" he asked, tentatively.

"Oh, mother! She generally stays at home—she says she's tired. That's one of the tragedies of getting old, isn't it? People tire so easily; they knock up over positively nothing."

"It sounds as if housekeeping under present conditions was rather strenuous."

"Oh, no—it isn't really," she said, cheerfully. "As a rule, it's nothing. It just happened that Mrs. Smith was ill."

"Yes, I see."

"Mother always has peaceful afternoons, sewing. As we are out all day, some one has to mend our clothes. Mother is a beautiful worker. She took us and our clothes over because when Gladys was climbing on to the top of an omnibus one day she dropped her shoe off into the road, and she had to tell the conductor that she couldn't possibly get down and retrieve it because she had a hole in her stocking; and he said, quite nicely, 'Well, miss, we'll just wait a minute and see what happens.'"

"And what happened?" he asked, with interest.

"Oh, a soldier who was driving behind us in a motor-borry jumped out and picked it up and handed it to the conductor, and he took it up to Gladys. Mother was horribly shocked—she's a perfect dear, but just a wee-bit old-fashioned—and she said she must take us and our stockings over, so that it couldn't happen again. Of course, Gladys wouldn't have told her if she'd known how frightfully she'd hate it; but she just has a great basket of mendings to settle down to every afternoon—very peaceful."

"Yes, and what else?"

"Oh, there's nothing else. She likes pottering about the house. And we did prevent her going to the depot twice a week, as she wanted to. We simply wouldn't listen to her. She isn't really a bit strong, and I don't know how we should carry on if she got ill. Oh, did I tell you about the air raid? We had just got to bed when we heard refugees from the other flats clamoring at the door. Of course, the first-story flats have to be kind and neighborly, and some one has to get up and let them in and be a sort of hostess."

"Good night!" said the Colonel. "What a horror it adds to life, as well as to death! Well, who was hostess?"

"Why, mother, of course. Gladys and I put cotton-wool in our ears and went off to sleep. It's quite easy, really. You see, as we were doing war work, we couldn't sit up and burn the candle at both ends."

"She seems to do her bit," he said, thoughtfully.

"What—mother?" Doreen was genuinely amused. "Why, she doesn't do a thing. That's just what I'm explaining to you. We won't let her. We soon sat on that idea about the depot. At her age, and with two healthy daughters, it would be absolutely ridiculous for her to take up any war work."

"Well, I must go," said the Colonel.

"Oh, do wait," said Doreen, hospitably. "I have to be off, but mother will be in directly. She has just gone to the district visitors' meeting. She took over my district and my Penny Bank when I started work; but she's generally back by one."

The Colonel rose and took up his hat—not the sacred pre-war London ornament to which life had accustomed him, but the dull head-covering of the ineligible and the retired. As he mechanically smoothed it on his coat sleeve, with Doreen's alert eye on his leisurely movements, he said:

"Don't you think she might have preferred the depot?"

"Perhaps she might," said Doreen, austere. "She's frightfully patriotic. But she couldn't do it—she'd break down in a week. Gladys and I simply put our foot down. You've got to be young to do war work."

"I think he's really a little doty," Doreen said to Gladys later. "He seemed to have a fixed idea that mother was doing war work, although I explained over and over again. He didn't seem able to take it in. It's stupid, of course, but rather pathetic."—G. R. Glasgow, in Christian World, London.

In the Prophet's Room.

Eugenie du Maurier.

"And she went up, and laid him on the bed of the man of God, and shut the door upon him, and went out."—2 Kings 4:21.

The Shunammite woman referred to affords one of the most striking illustrations in all Scripture of the way in which we ought to commit our troubles and trials to God. She had lost her only son, who had been given to her as a special gift of God. She held him dead in her arms. What could she do? There was a consecrated room in her house where she entertained the prophet of God, and this room meant to her the very presence of God, so she took her precious burden "and she went up" there. How blessed it is for us, too, to be able to go up to the secret place of the Most High and to bring our troubles under the shadow of the Almighty! This is the place of refuge where the weary, the helpless and the broken-hearted find relief.

"And she laid him on the bed of the man of God." That is a beautiful picture of committal: so should we lay our trouble, our business, our whole life on God, even as this poor bereaved mother laid her burden on the Lord and left it there. "Commit . . . trust . . . and He worketh."

It is a difficult thing to do—to leave our burdens with God after we have put them there, but it is also a blessed thing to do, and it grows easier with practice.

"And shut the door . . . and went out." The temptation is to not shut the door. We still see our trouble; we still handle it; we go over it again and again. We think our presence with it is needed, while His presence is all sufficient. It takes faith to "shut the door" and go out; it takes real confidence for us to let the matter that is troubling us pass entirely out of our hands into God's; but in no other way can God fully work. The corn of wheat must be hidden from the eyes of man if it is ever to bring forth fruit. The Shunammite woman committed her dead child entirely to God and went out, shutting the door. No wonder that she could say afterward, when questioned, "It is well." There is no safer place in all the universe to leave our loved ones than in the hands of God. No wonder that, with a faith like this, she received her dead son back to life!

We certainly believe that there is many a son or daughter, given as a special gift of God, and now dead in trespasses and sins, who, if wholly committed to God in definite faith, will surely be restored and saved. We certainly believe, also, that for every burden, trial or care, which we thus utterly and trustfully leave with God, He will work blessing above all we ask or think.

"Gossip Town."

Have you ever heard of Gossip Town,
On the shores of Falsehood Bay,
Where old Dame Rumor, with rustling gown,

Is going the live long day?
It isn't far to Gossip Town
For people who want to go;
The idleness train will take you down
In just an hour or so.

The Thoughtless Road is a popular route,
And most folks start that way,
But it's steep down grade; if you don't watch out,

You'll land in Falsehood Bay.
You glide through the Valley of Vicious
Town,

And into the tunnel of Hate,
Then crossing the Add-to bridge you walk
Right into the City Gate.

The Principal Street is called "They say,"
and "I've Heard" is the public well.
And the breezes that blow from Falsehood
Bay

Are laden with "Don't you tell."
In the midst of the town is "Tell-tale Park."

You are never quite safe while there,
For its owner is Madame "Suspicious Remark,"
Who lives on the street "Don't Care."

Just back of the Park is Slanderer's Row,
'Twas there that Good Name died,
Pierced by the dart from Jealousy's bow,
In the hands of Envious Pride.
From Gossip Town peace long since fled,
But envy and strife and woe
And sorrow and care you'll find instead,
If ever you chance to go.

Making Money in Country Churches for War Purposes.

The present war emergency has developed many ways by which organizations within country churches can assist the government and at the same time assist themselves. It has been increasingly a practice for Sunday school classes to invest in Christmas savings funds such as are run under the auspices of many banks. This practice could readily be transferred to the purchase of War Savings Stamps each week or each month, according to the size and financial ability of the class. Where this is done the teacher could point out something of the significance of this war for childhood, and for the better world that will come for the children when they grow to be men and women, because of the sacrifices which all are making now.

For Sunday school classes of country churches it would be entirely possible to raise a pig or two. It would net the class a handsome profit, and, at the same time, increase the supply of fat, which is so vitally important in the winning of the war. It would be easy for the boys of the class to share the care of the animal, perhaps taking it to their own farms for several weeks at a time in rotation.

Another suggestion, for the Ladies' Aid, concerns itself with the production of food. How many Ladies' Aid Societies spend long hours in the spring and summer quilting for a return which seldom averages more than three cents an hour per members working? Most of these women keep their own gardens at home, in order that their husbands may do the heavier farm work. How much better than quilting would be the turning over of part of the Church land to the Ladies' Aid for a war garden, where, with a smaller expenditure of time per member, a far larger financial return to the organization could be earned, and, in addition, there would be the great consciousness of having helped in the raising of food for the feeding of the hungry world. The produce from this garden could be canned, either by the Girls' Canning Club, where such exists, or by the ladies themselves, and could then be shipped to the Women's Exchange of the nearest city and sold at a considerable profit. Some of the Ladies' Aid Societies have raised large sums in this way and have established permanent and satisfactory business relations with certain selected city customers.

The thought and ingenuity of each church's War Committee can well be directed in these trying times to the working out of similar plans which can help both the government and the Church organizations.—Selected.

Behind Shut Doors.

By L. S. Marye, Charlottesville, Va.

The Iliad of Homer and Milton's Paradise Lost are the two great epic poems of the world. We have many beautiful lyric and elegiac poems, but only these two great epics.

It is a remarkable and almost incredible fact that both Milton and Homer were blind when they wrote these poems. It would seem that the light of the natural world was shut out that there might be let in to them with greater effulgence the light of the spiritual world—

"The light that never was on land or sea,
The consecration and the poet's dream."

Think of these two grand old men groping their way through the world blind and feeble, turning their sightless orbs up to heaven for an inspiration from the spiritual world! It must have been a sight to make both men angels weep, and yet rejoice.

On Guard.

You have a little prisoner,
He's nimble, sharp and clever,
He's sure to get away from you
Unless you watch him ever.

And when he once gets out he makes
More trouble in an hour
Than you can stop, in many a day,
Working with all your power.

He gets your playmates by the ears,
He says what isn't so,
And uses many ugly words
No good for you to know.

Quick, fasten tight the ivory gates,
And chain him while he's young!
For this same dangerous prisoner
Is just—your little tongue!

Mary Wins the Star.

Linda Stevens Almond.

The three little Gordons seated themselves at the supper table with a great deal of suppressed excitement. It was their pleasant custom to relate to their parents each evening the "glad act" they had done during the day, and the child who had done the most commendable thing in the parents' opinion was permitted to wear a pretty silver star for the next twenty-four hours. It was all new and intensely interesting to Mary Gordon, their ten-year-old cousin, who had come that very day to spend an indefinite length of time. Her father was a doctor who had given his services to his country, and her mother, a trained nurse, had accompanied him on his journey across the sea.

"Elizabeth always tells her story first," said Aunt Maud, smiling upon the group.

"Maybe company has one to tell," spoke up Uncle Dick, and he fondly patted Mary's sunny head.

"Oh, indeed, I don't know anything," Mary declared.

"Perhaps you can think of something, dear, while the others are talking," suggested Aunt Maud. "Now, Elizabeth, suppose you begin."

"Mary's homesick," suddenly piped little Anne. "She told us so, didn't you, Mary?"

Mary's sweet face flushed with embarrassment.

"It isn't nice to give away confidences, Anne dear," gently rebuked Aunt Maud.

"I did feel pretty sad," said Mary, smiling bravely at her relatives, "but I am not going to be any more."

"Good!" cried Uncle Dick. "You have the Gordon grit, Mary."

"Now, Elizabeth, begin," laughed her mother, "for I am sure you can't contain yourself a minute longer."

"A lady on the car today had two teeny little children," Elizabeth began almost breathlessly, "and they both started to cry, and the poor lady looked as if she didn't know what in the world to do, because everybody was looking at her just as though it was her fault that they were crying. So I leaned over and told her that if she would let me I would try to amuse one of them, and she was so glad that she lifted one over beside me right away.

I showed the poor little thing my wrist-watch and let her hear it tick, and soon she was as quiet as you please. The lady stopped the other one from crying, and when she got off she thanked me over and over again."

"Oh, Elizabeth," cried Mary with beaming eyes, "wasn't that perfectly lovely. And could the baby talk?"

"Just baby talk," answered Elizabeth. "But she was so cute, and she patted my cheek, and they all waved goodbye."

"That was a deed of kindness, daughter," said Mrs. Gordon softly. "I hope you will always be as thoughtful when you can be of some assistance to some one. Now, Anne dear, what have you to tell us?"

"I carried out a pan of water for thirsty street dogs," lisped little Anne. "They wouldn't drink while I was there, but I peeped from the window and saw two great big dogs lapping and lapping the water."

"Why, baby, that was splendid," approved her father.

"Yes, it was," the others chorused, regarding little Anne with loving eyes.

"Now, Frank," said Mrs. Gordon, nodding to her eleven-year-old son, "what is your story?"

"Oh, I gave my lunch money to an old colored woman," broke out Frank. "She was begging to get enough money to go in a Home for the Aged."

"And didn't you eat any lunch, Frank?" Mary solemnly inquired.

"He ate nearly a whole pie when he came home," said Elizabeth.

"That was all right," smiled Mrs. Gordon. "And it was very good pie, wasn't it, son? Anyway, you spent your lunch money wisely."

"Have you thought of anything to tell, Mary?" asked Elizabeth.

"Mary wrote a letter," chirped Anne.

"Oh, yes," cried Elizabeth excitedly, "do tell about it, Mary, for really and truly it is something."

Mary flushed.

"Perhaps," said Aunt Maud, kindly, "Mary does not wish to tell."

"Oh, I don't mind," Mary hastened to say. "It was only that I didn't want to make father and mother feel blue, so I wrote a real funny letter."

"My, it was funny," broke in Elizabeth. "Really and truly jokey, and—Mary, may I tell all?"

Mary became confused. "I—I suppose so," she assented.

"Well," proceeded Elizabeth with radiant eyes, "the whole time Mary was writing that bright, jokey letter she was crying perfectly awful."

Mary drooped her sunny head in embarrassment.

"You need not be ashamed, Mary dear," said Aunt Maud tenderly, "for to be able to write a bright letter under such circumstances is something to be justly proud of."

Then quite suddenly Aunt Maud rose, and walking around to Mary's side, kissed her trembling mouth, and to the astonishment of all pinned the silver star on her dress.

"Three cheers for Mary!" cried Frank.

"Mary certainly deserved the star today," commented Uncle Dick.

And Mary's bright face glowed with pleasure.

A Fable of Long Ago.

Once upon a time, when the world was young, all the insects passed in review before the great king. Each one in turn was assigned some task for which he was peculiarly fitted. The bee was bidden to gather honey from the flowers and to store it carefully in waxen cells. The butterfly was destined to flit hither and thither from blossom to blossom, wave his many-colored wings, and add to the beauty of the earth. The ant was commanded to toil busily day after day and set an example of thrift and economy. Last of all, the little black cricket, clad in shining armor, leaped before the great king. "What canst thou do, my tiny subject?" asked the king benignantly. "I can cheer mankind with my one note and be faithful," chirped the cricket modestly. "It is well," said the king reassuringly. "Throughout all the coming ages it shall be thy task to sing the weary world to sleep. During the peaceful summer night thou shalt never cease thy soothing note, and all earth's tired children shall bless thee for thy lullaby."

And the cricket has been faithful to its trust throughout the long centuries, never ceasing his monotonous "Creek-creek-creek" in the quiet summer nights.—Child's Hour.

Kathleen and the Fuller's Earth.

Kathleen and her little brother Robin were out in the back yard playing happily with a pile of fuller's earth that the carpenters had left. They had mixed water with the earth and were busily moulding shapes—birds, beasts and people. That is, Kathleen was making shapes; what four-year-old Robin had made bore little resemblance to anything alive, but he thought they did, and he worked on with great industry.

Just as mother came to the window Kathleen gave a little cry of satisfaction. "Look at my dove," she said. "That's the best thing I've done yet."

"Let Robin see!" the small boy cried, dropping his own clay. He took the earthen bird carefully from his sister's hand and turned it over and over admiringly. "But birds must fly," he exclaimed, suddenly. "I don't like a bird unless it flies."

Before either mother or sister could stop him he grasped the little figure by its head and tried to pry open the clay wings. Of course the head fell off. Robin stood, surprised and silent, gazing at the mischief he had done. His lips quivered.

Kathleen was terribly angry. "You bad, bad boy!" she cried. "Mother, punish him! He purposely wrung the neck of my beautiful dove. I've a great mind to break every one of those queer things he has made."

As her mother stood silent and Robin glanced up with wet lashes, she stamped her foot. "He's a bad boy," she repeated, and her eyes flashed.

Robin looked at her curiously. Then he turned to his mother. "I didn't mean to break her bird," he said. His own face was flushed; he looked angry himself now.

Mrs. Dent came out and picked up the broken pieces. "Why can't you soften the earth and then mend the bird?" she asked.

Kathleen looked scornful. "Why, mother, it might not turn out the same again, at all. You see, I had shaped the dove just right in the soft clay, then it hardened in that shape. Now the work is all undone."

Mrs. Dent looked straight into the tearful eyes. "I quite understand, dear," she said. "And I'm ever so sorry about the bird. But think, was it worth the temper you showed before your little brother?"

Small Robin had gone back to his moulding now, and did not hear. Kathleen hesitated for an answer; already her flare of anger was quite cool.

"A tiny child's mind," her mother went on, "is just as soft and easy to shape as any material in the world. Every single impression, every touch, every influence goes into moulding it. That's why an older sister or brother should be so careful."

"O, I hadn't thought about that," Kathleen interrupted. She turned suddenly to brush off a place on the bench where her mother might sit, and before she knew it had swept to the ground a whole row of tiny, shapeless earthen figures—Robin's "animals" just moulded with painful care and put out to dry. Unfortunately, a tub of water from which the children had been moistening the earth was near enough at hand to receive the whole lot.

Robin straightened up with a quick word. It took him several seconds to realize what had happened, then his countenance changed. "You bad, bad girl!" he cried, shrilly. "You did it a' purpose, you did it a' purpose!"

Kathleen darted forward. "No, I didn't, Robbie!" she said, soothingly. "Indeed I didn't."

But the child's face was red. He stamped one small foot angrily. "Mommie, punish Kathleen!" he said, and his blue eyes flashed.

His mimicry of her own anger, unconscious though it was, seemed so perfect that Kathleen burst out laughing. She could not help recognizing every gesture of her own rage of a few minutes before. "You blessed parrot!" she exclaimed, and caught the excited little fellow in her arms, still laughing.

But when she glanced up at her mother's face the laughter stopped. She got up soberly, and without a word began to mix more clay for Robin. "Shall I make you a true-as-life kangaroo?" she said, and he nodded all smiles again.

When the kangaroo was hopping cheerfully around the yard in the grasp of a grimy little hand, the older sister turned to her mother. "Why, mother," she exclaimed, "he hadn't forgotten one thing I did or said. I didn't know—I never thought."

Her mother's answer was gentle, and together they fished the unhappy shapes from the water. But Kathleen was still troubled. "What if he had hardened that way?" she said.

Mother smiled. "Never mind, he hasn't," she answered, as Robin's glad laughter floated back to them. "And next time you'll be more careful with the moulding, I'm sure."

"I'm sure, too," said Kathleen, softly.

Tommy Jinks.

"Well, I declare," exclaimed Aunt Jane, "there is that terrible boy in our apple tree again. 'Boy! Boy!' she called, shaking her finger reprovingly at a small figure just discernible among the leaves and branches of the tree.

"Here I am; here I am!" he jeered, standing on a low branch and waving his cap in one hand, while he held on with the other, then dropped nimbly to the ground and was gone.

"I don't mind the apples that child takes near as much as I do his tantalizing ways," she pouted.

"Aunt Jane, that is the worst boy in Gloversville—everybody says so. He fought Bennie Belden and blacked his eye, and Bennie's big brother beat him, but it never did a bit of good. He beat Tommy Haynes yesterday, and he takes apples and things from the girls. His name's Tommy Jinks, and the big boys beat him whenever they get a chance."

"Oh, well, I wouldn't beat the child," said Aunt Jane, "though to be sure he's awfully bad. He looks ragged and poor. I wonder where the poor little fellow lives."

"He doesn't live anywhere, I think," said Blanche; "such a bad boy I never saw before; he unties my apron strings and snatched away the verberna bouquet I had for Miss Lucy this morning. I wish John Beldon would give him another good beating."

"I don't," said Aunt Jane resolutely, "and, children, you must never wish harm to any one. If he untied your apron strings they can be retied, and if he takes your bouquet—just think, dears, he has no home, and—and—"

"And no Aunt Jane," finished Blanche, putting her arm around Aunt Jane's waist and rubbing her rosy cheek against Aunt Jane's plump arm. There were tears in Aunt Jane's eyes and her lips were quivering, for she was thinking of how her darlings might have fared had she not been spared to live and work for them.

"Yes, Aunt Jane," said Frank, who did not understand the cause of his aunt's emotion, but felt her sympathy, "and every one picks on him so—I suppose that makes him mean, too."

"And, Aunt Jane," apologized Blanche, "I did feel so angry about the flowers, I guess I must have been as bad as he was in my thoughts, but I will never wish harm to any one again."

"Now that is right of you both," said Miss Jane, brightly, "just like my good children. We will have a little feast of warm apple tarts in five minutes—as soon as they are nicely browned."

"Here I am. Here I am!" shouted a shrill voice, and the children turned to the window just in time to see a small figure swing a torn hat defiantly for a moment, and then fall, branch and all, to the ground. Up the little fellow jumped, but not quickly enough to avoid Aunt Jane, who had rushed out, expecting to find Tommy Jinks bruised and maimed.

"You can't hurt me," cried Tommy, finding it impossible to break away from Aunt Jane's grasp. "You can beat me and bang me, but you can't hurt me. I'll break your trees and eat your apples, I will," he finished desperately as they entered the kitchen.

"Now," said Aunt Jane, releasing her firm grip on Tommy's arm and offering the little culprit a chair. "I'm going to give you some apple tarts with my children, and then you may go; and when you are hungry, if you'll come here, you shall have lunch with us, and in return I will be ever so much obliged if you will quit climbing my trees and shaking down my apples, for you ruin more than you eat."

Tommy Jinks looked at Miss Jane in sheepish amazement, for this was a kind of treatment he was quite unused to, but his surprise did not take away his appetite by any means, and the number of tarts he disposed of astonished even Frank. After eating, Tommy grasped his hat eagerly and disappeared as though fearing Aunt Jane might change her mind and detain him. The next afternoon he was seen standing by the same apple tree looking undecidedly toward the house. Miss Jane beckoned him in.

"You didn't want to beat me when I was in your apple tree, did you?"

"No, indeed," said Aunt Jane, reassuringly; "I did not want you in any one's apple tree, because you have no right there, you know," she added, smiling gently at the little vagabond.

The next day he appeared again, and this time Aunt Jane sent him to do an errand. And so, in time, other people finding him trusty and honest, were glad to send by Tommy, too, but as Aunt Jane was his best friend, she remained his best and dearest, and it was with her help that Tommy prospered.—Z. O. Acton, in the Northwestern Christian Advocate.

"Butterflies."

Elizabeth Mears, Aged 14, Bixom, Va.

Behold the butterflies nestling among the flowers,

Sailing up and up, 'round and 'round, Whirling away the hours!

Some are white, some are brown,

Some are tan and blue,

Others are of a bright golden hue.

Are they not little beauties,

Flitting through the air,

Making graceful circles

Here, there and everywhere?

The Flying-Squirrel.

"Of all the tenants of the woods, the flying-squirrel is perhaps the most seldom seen, yet that is not due to any scarcity of the little animal, which, in fact, is among the most numerous of the squirrel family, but to its habit of moving almost entirely at night. Should you doubt this last statement, enter some patch of forest convenient to your home and strike solidly upon the trunks of such trees as appear to be dead and have one or more holes in the trunk; in about one time out of five your efforts will be rewarded by the appearance in the opening, as if by magic, of the bright eyes and upstanding ears of a flying-squirrel.

"These squirrels do not, of course, fly; but their legs are connected at the 'wrists' with a light membrane which serves as a sort of parachute, although it has some of the possibilities of an aeroplane. Before making a flight, the squirrel will run rapidly up the trunk of a tree and, when he has attained a sufficient height, spring boldly off into space. With legs spread wide apart, so as to present the greatest possible surface to the air, and his extraordinarily wide and fluffy tail serving as a rudder, the squirrel sails swiftly through the air, often for one hundred feet or even more, until he reaches the trunk of another tree, up which he runs in order to attain height for a new flight. By this method flying-squirrels are able rapidly to cover long distances with little exertion, for often, when nearing the end of a long sail, they will point themselves upward and by means of their 'rudders' and the impetus given will rise almost to the height at which they started—just as a boy riding down hill may be carried over a lesser up-grade at the foot."—A. E. Swoyer, in the January St. Nicholas.

Palmore: Another sheaf has been garnered, ripe and ready for the Reaper's shining blade, when MISS IDA PALMORE was suddenly cut down at the Retreat for the Sick, July 4, 1918.

For more than thirty years she had been the esteemed and loved housekeeper of the institution.

With characteristic gentleness and sweetness of temper, she exercised control of those over whom she had authority and dispensed the hospitality in a gracious, courteous manner.

She was respected by those she controlled and loved by all with whom her duties brought her in contact.

A life pure in spirit, full of kindness and a desire to meet all demand for assistance in the hospital. Therefore be it

1. Resolved, The removal of Miss Ida Palmore leaves a vacancy which the Board of Managers deeply feel, and will long cherish her memory.

2. That while we do not understand the mystery of death we believe in the promise, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

3. That in heartfelt sympathy with the relatives, we are submissive to the will of our Father, whose wisdom we question not.

4. That these resolutions be placed on the minutes, and a copy sent the family and published in the Southern Churchman.

MRS. W. F. RICHARDSON.

MRS. H. W. SHELTON,

Waldrop: Entered into life eternal July 18, 1918, RICHARD W. Waldrop, son of the late Christopher and Ellen Douglas Waldrop, in his seventy-ninth year.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

Wise: HENRY ALEXANDER WISE died at Norfolk, Va., July 11 last in his seventy-ninth year.

He was a son of John C. Wise, and was educated at the Virginia Military Institute, from which he graduated just at the breaking out of the Civil War. He served with the Wise Brigade in West Virginia, as adjutant of Col. Fry's regiment, and at Roanoke Island, where he was made prisoner and paroled.

The period of parole was passed by Henry Wise as assistant professor of mathematics at the V. M. I. The corps of cadets was called into active service in 1864, and Henry Wise was its senior captain. When Colonel Shipp fell wounded in the action at New Market, the command of the cadets was assumed by Captain Wise, which duty he discharged with good judgment and distinguished gallantry.

The splendid courage of Virginia's young soldiers at New Market marks one of the finest pages in the military history of the Confederacy. Later Captain Wise was transferred to the artillery, in which he served to the end of the war.

Captain Wise's service as a teacher at the Institute determined his later career. After a term at the Norfolk Military Academy, he became identified with the public school system of Baltimore, and to this work gave forty years of his life, being made successively assistant superintendent and superintendent.

The keynote of Henry Wise's character was one of unswerving devotion to duty, and from this pursuit nothing turned him aside. It was his peculiarity to make the careers of many young men his special care, always trying to elevate the moral side of their character.

Endowed with unusual scholarship and regarded as an authority on matters educational, his disposition was retiring, and one of singular modesty. Honors he cared little for, and publicity he shunned as far as possible.

Henry Wise's Christian faith had in it the beautiful acceptance and dependence of a child in its mother's love, and in this faith and simplicity he lived beloved and admired by a large circle of friends, both in his native State and Maryland, where he so long labored. He was a co-worker with the lamented Bishop Randolph in his work at Emmanuel in Baltimore.

He was unmarried, and is survived by a sister, Mrs. Craft, of Norfolk, and Medical Director John C. Wise, U. S. N. "Oh, just and faithful knighting of God Ride on, the prize is new."

EMILE HOFFMAN STEVENS.

Passed from this to the life eternal. at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Rowland Lea, Montrose, Va., EMILY HOFFMAN STEVENS, wife of the late John H. Stevens, on the evening of July 1, 1918, in the eighty-fourth year of her age.

She was the oldest communicant of Ascension Church, New York City, of which she had been a devoted member since her girlhood.

Last of her family, last of her generation of Hoffmans, she embodied those qualities of mind and heart which make a people great, added to a rare personality that caused her to be the center of every circle in which she moved. Her faith, ever a radiant torch undimmed by the changes and chances of a long life, gave her an intensely vital grasp on things eternal and enabled her to make heaven very real to those about her; so that the sadness of farewell is mercifully swallowed up in the consciousness of her beautiful entrance into joys of the Lord.

She is survived by six children, Winthrop Gilman Stevens, Lindley Murray Stevens, Sydney G. Stevens, George C. Stevens, Theodora Hoffman Lea and Edith Barretto Parsons.

Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.

There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, as Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.

Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.

Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

COLLEGE OF William & Mary

1693 Historic in Association;
Modern in Equipment; 1918
Progressive in Spirit;

William and Mary offers every advantage of a modern, liberal education in a cultured and historic community. Chartered by King William and Queen Mary, developed by such officials as Jefferson, Washington and John Tyler, it has for 221 years served the cause of American education. It educated John Marshall, James Monroe, Winfield Scott, George Wythe, Peyton Randolph, Jefferson and Tyler; its recent students are leaders in Virginia today.

Full Collegiate courses leading to the A. B., B. S., and M. A. degrees. Large, efficient faculty. High entrance and academic standards. Excellent laboratory facilities for the study of the natural sciences, drawing and manual arts. 12 buildings with modern equipment; heating and power plant; large shaded campus; 25 acre athletic grounds.

The College of William and Mary is the Teachers' College of Virginia; special two-year course, based on high school graduation, for the teachers' diploma. 132 scholarships for men and women training to be teachers. Free tuition to ministerial students. Special pre-medical course. All courses open to men and women.

The honor-system of student government had its origin at William and Mary. Pure religious and social surroundings; student life free from harmful and costly habits; low expenses made possible through state aid and situation in an inexpensive community.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great.

In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

The man who is willing to face failure finds success.

Difficulties are the stones out of which all God's houses are built.

Talent sees opportunity, genius creates it, but only patience and labor reap its most perfect reward.

If you want to learn how to become a cheerful giver, the right way to begin is by being a systematic one.

Peace in this life springs from acquiescence in disagreeable things, not in exemption from bearing them.

God sends great angels in our sore dismay,
But little ones go in and out each day.

Prayer without faith is of no more use than one wing: neither Christian nor bird will be lifted from the ground, much less soar.

Who can tell all that he knows; who can translate his highest thoughts into language that men may understand? But, blessed be God, we may live what we feel!

Like the star that shines afar,
Without haste and without rest,
Let each man wheel with steady sway
Round the task that rules the day,
And do his best.

Half the world is on the wrong scent in the pursuit of happiness. They think it consists in having and getting and in being served by others. It consists in giving and in serving others.—Henry Drummond.

It was when he laid down calmly by the dark river of doubt that Jacob was visited by an angel with a blessing; it was when he made himself content on another strange road, with a hard stone for a pillow that it was given him to see a ladder of light stretching between the earth and heaven.

"It requires pluck to be patient." Perhaps you don't believe this; but just try it the next time a tedious task is before you, or a wearisome pain is to be borne. Patience isn't a tame, colorless virtue. It is born of courage and will-power. There is a pluck to bear as fine as any pluck to do.

God is girding every man for a place and a calling, in which, taking it from Him, even though it be internally humble, he may be as consciously exalted as if he held the rule of a kingdom. The truth I propose, then, for your consideration is this: "That God has a definite life-plan for every human person, girding him, visibly or invisibly, for some exact thing, which it will be the true significance and glory of his life to have accomplished." Many persons, I am well aware, never think of any such thing. They suppose that, for most men, life is a necessarily stale and common affair. What it means for them they do not know, and they scarcely conceive that it means anything.—Bushnell.

Our youth went by in recklessness and haste,
And precious things were lost as soon as gained;
Yet patiently our Father saw the waste
And gathered up the fragments that remained.

Taught by His love we learned to love aright;
Led by His hand we passed through dreary ways;
And now how lovely is the mellow light
That shines so calmly on our latter days.

—Sarah Doudney.

Witness at Home: Some who would not hesitate to speak of spiritual things to casual strangers find their tongues tied when they ought to speak for God to a wife, a husband, a brother, or a child. It is perhaps because we have an instinctive feeling that our intimate associates know us too well; they would feel that some inconsistency, not to say insincerity, in our Christian conversation should make us silent. Let our thought of our duty to those we love drive us to commune with our hearts and discover what it is that ties our tongue and hinders us from giving the word of warning or exhortation that is due.—C. Bickersteth.

WHERE DRUGS FAIL.

Many chronic diseases fail to respond to drug treatment, even in the hands of the best physicians, whereas acute diseases usually respond readily. When a disease has become chronic, drugs often seem to do as much harm as they do good, for the system rebels against them. It is just this class of cases which derive the greatest benefit from Shivar Mineral Water. If you suffer with chronic dyspepsia, indigestion, sick headache, rheumatism, gall stones, kidney or liver disease, uric acid poisoning or other conditions due to impure blood, do not hesitate to accept Mr. Shivar's liberal offer as printed below. His records show that only two in a hundred on the average have reported "no beneficial results." This is a wonderful record from a truly wonderful spring. Simply sign the following letter:

Shivar Spring.

NOTE:—"I have had the pleasure of serving the little church at Shivar Spring as Pastor for years, and am therefore well acquainted with Mr. Shivar and his associates, whom I gladly commend as honorable business men and worthy of the confidence of the public. I have personally derived great benefit from the use of the Shivar Mineral Water and have knowledge of its beneficial effects in a great number and variety of cases."—Rev. A. McA. Pittman.

Blessed Interruptions.

"I thought I was going to have a long, quiet morning for letter-writing, but I don't believe there has been a half hour that one or the other of those children haven't called from the foot of the stairs," said Margaret, half laughing, but with a little note of impatience in her voice. "But the childish calls sound so homelike and dear," answered Ruth, smiling, but with a wistfulness on her face that brought to Margaret a swift remembrance of her friend's broken home and the anxiety about absent ones.

"Oh"—she began, but Ruth interposed protestingly.

"My dear, I think you are a beautiful sister! Don't fancy for a minute that I was criticising you; it's only that such blessed interruptions are among the things I've been missing most in the long months with the family away. I used to think it delightful to have a whole day to myself, but since I've been alone, just boarding, it sometimes seems, when I hear the other calls about the house, that I'd give anything to be needed in the old way once more—to have some one want me and think, as the home folks used to think, that no one but Ruth could do certain things they wanted done. You don't know how blessed it is to be needed."

Few of us do realize the preciousness of the dear homely needs and calls until something takes them out of our life. There are so many things that seem much more important when one is young. You have so many plans, and there are so many interruptions. You wonder sometimes why father must lose his umbrella and his slippers so often, and why grandmother thinks you are the only one to hold her skein of yarn exactly right when she wants to wind it. It is wonderful, too, how certain the different members of the family are that it "will be only a step out of your way" to mail letters and exchange library books when you are going down town. You have even caught yourself wondering—and have been promptly ashamed of it—why dear mother's headache must select such an inconvenient day as the day when you wanted to go to a picnic. As for the children, they always know that it is "sister" who must dress the dolls and "help a fellow with his 'rithmetic."

But all these things are high testimony to your value and your pleasantness in the home circle. If you were really unwilling and disobliging how long do you suppose these calls would come to you? Father and grandmother would soon turn to some one else, and the children would carry their requests elsewhere. You are storing up a wealth of memory treasures in your answer to these many calls, even though they may often interfere with your plans and interrupt your occupations. The sweet-tempered, helpful girl in the home is filling her rightful place, and "doing her bit" for her country and her Lord.—Queens Gardens.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

THE REPORT OF GERMAN ATROCITIES.

An aged and most respected subscriber, who cannot for a moment be suspected of pro-German sympathies, has written us a kind personal letter warning us against publishing articles in regard to German methods of conducting war which, he thinks, "with a little investigation would prove to be untrue." He reminds us of the falsehoods and calumnies which were circulated in some quarters during and after the War Between the States against the government and people of the Confederacy, "engendered by the passions of war," and reminds us how carefully the Church especially should guard against such misrepresentation. The particular article to which he refers is one claiming to be an official report from the German General Headquarters on the bombing of American hospitals, which appeared on our "Christianity and the Community" page, June 29, taken from the Red Cross Bulletin. It recounted a number of successful raids made upon Red Cross hospitals behind the American lines, and the losses inflicted not only upon the wounded patients but upon surgeons, nurses, civilians and even little children, who under all the laws of civilized warfare are immune from attack, by the unerring aim of their "heroic fliers." Another old Confederate, in a letter in this issue, raises the same point.

We can sympathize with the horror of our chivalrous correspondents and with their convictions, which would ordinarily be well-founded, that it is incredible that a confession of such foul deeds should be officially made even if the facts could be accepted as stated. But we have no reason to doubt that the report was officially given out, and that it "shows clearly the German attitude of mind," as our associate editor wrote. It is altogether of a piece with what we know of the German methods and animus. It was hard for us to arrive at the conclusion, first, that the military caste in Germany had deliberately adopted their no less than infernal policy of frightfulness, inhumanity and hate as a part of their boasted system of warfare, and second, that they had schooled the minds of a subservient and slavish people to such veneration of their astuteness and acquiescence to their will that their ideals and methods should be accepted not only with complacency but with pride. But the facts are too well authenticated to admit of doubt. It seems certain that to the minds of the German people anything, literally anything whatever, that conduces or can be supposed to conduce to the advancement, conquest and supremacy of the German superman and his domination in the world is pleasing to the gods, is in accordance with the supreme law of right and of human development, and is to be adopted and pursued without qualm or question. And this includes the violation of every accepted rule of honor, decency and humanity. Moreover, they have been taught by those whose guidance must be implicitly obeyed to hate the British and Americans especially with an implacable hatred as the jealous enemies of their lawful ambitions and the spiteful authors of all their miseries. This being understood, it is quite compatible with the purpose of their leaders that their venom and lust for cruelty should be fed by official reports of vengeance and frightfulness wreaked upon their insolent opponents by their successful raiders. And such news, we fear, is received by the people of that unhappy country with an avidity and satisfaction quite incomprehensible to those whose instincts have not been vitiated by the subtle poison of German kultur.

It is not pleasant to write such an indictment against one's fellow-creatures or to believe it when written. But facts are facts, and it is well for us to know what we are fighting. The Germans make no denial of these facts, and, indeed, cannot, for they speak for themselves. A gentleman told us recently of a conversation he had in New York with a wounded German officer fresh from the fields of Belgium shortly after the devastation of that country. He charged the Germans with protecting their marching troops from the attacks of Belgian "snipers" with a barricade of women and children and old men torn from their homes, expecting, of course, an indignant denial. To his equal surprise and disgust this officer replied, "Of course we do! It is our business to protect ourselves and our men, because we need them." And then he added, "The German High Commanders are the supreme masters of the science of war. We know that what they tell us to do is the right and proper thing to be done." Herein lies the explanation of the whole foul business so far as the German people are concerned. As to their masters we have no solution of the problem they present unless it be that they are literally possessed of the devil.

The cruel are always cowardly at heart, and the Nemesis of such an attitude of mind is an inability to understand the position of brave and true men. The Germans, we imagine, actually expected their policy of frightfulness to strike terror into the hearts of the allies and cause them to sue for an ignoble peace. Whatever may be said for their military and mechanical qualifications, their psychology has been woefully at fault. They cannot understand why Belgium sacrificed her country to save her soul. They did not see that every air raid over London would bring hundreds of volunteers to the British colors. They supposed their submarine piracy would keep American seamen cowering at home. They imagined that to wage war upon defenseless women and children was a good way to subdue the souls of decent men. They think that bombing our hospitals will drive them further back from the front and so increase the fatalities among our wounded. The answer of our brave surgeons and nurses has been and will be to pitch their hospitals closer and closer to the firing line. And such answers will continue to be given by an indignant, courageous and self-sacrificing civilization until honor and justice come again to their own, and Prussianism, having exposed its hideous capabilities to the utmost, shall be banished from the earth. God speed the day; and then, and not until then, give us peace!

To Our Subscribers, from the Business Office.

We receive many complaints that requests for change of address are not promptly attended to at this office. We would again call your attention to the notice which appears at the head of column 1, page 20, of each issue of the Southern Churchman that a change of address must be sent in two weeks before it is to go into effect. Also, we receive many complaints about the paper not coming regularly or not arriving before Sunday. We are very sorry for both of these inconveniences, but are powerless to remedy them. The Southern Churchman is sent out by the largest daily paper company in the city and not from this office, and is put into the mail every Thursday afternoon. If the papers are delayed it is the fault of the over-crowded mails; if they are lost it is because there was some accident in directing or carelessness in the post office, and we only know of it from the complaints reaching us. We are always glad to supply a missing number, but we wish our subscribers to know it isn't carelessness in this office.

Kindly Words.

From a private letter received by the editor, he makes bold to take the following extract:

"Although I am a Presbyterian, and a 'sort of bishop,' as Jed Hotchkiss said to George Peterkin when trying to arrange for a harmonious working of the home missionaries of the two branches of the Church, I have much enjoyed reading the Southern Churchman for over thirty years, not only because it has always contained so much that is very good, but also because it has contained so little of the bigotry and exclusiveness which some correspondents will express in their communications to their respective denominational papers.

"When such narrow spirit is openly condemned and rebuked by more of our members, and when we have more such articles as that of James H. Dillard in your issue of the 13th instant, and as your leading editorial of the 20th instant, and as many editorials of the late William Meade Clark, then we will have more of the spirit of unity."

Book Notices

(All books reviewed at any time in this column may be ordered at the publisher's price given, plus postage 15 cents, from the book department of the Southern Churchman.)

Studies in Christianity. By A. Clutton-Brock. E. P. Dutton & Co, New York. Pp. 180. $1.25.

The author says in his preface, "It is necessary, I think, to rid Christianity of beliefs that can no longer be held; but before we do that we must state as clearly as possible what we believe to be the essence of it." This is the trivial task which he confidently undertook in this volume of less than two hundred pages, through which he wanders obscurely in the fog of his own verbosity. He has the grace to acknowledge that his book is not complete, and that he "was not able to express even all that Christianity means" to himself; of which we are very glad. He is a clever writer, and there is much in this book that is thought-provoking and even constructive; but a Christianity as baseless as this conception of it would not survive for a single generation.

The Call of a World Task in War Time. By J. Lovell Murray, Educational Secretary, Student Volunteer Movement. New York. Student Volunteer Movement, 25 Madison Avenue. Pp. 214. Cloth 60 cents; paper 40 cents.

This is an attempt at a course of study, "interpreting the present world situation in terms of missionary responsibility," adapted for use in study classes in connection with the Students' Missionary Movement. It contains little that is new, but the facts and considerations presented will make a strong appeal to those to whom they come thus formulated. The chapter calling for "A Full Mobilization of Christian Forces" would be stronger if the mobilization of the Church herself had been first insisted upon. It is strange that the necessity for Church unity as a condition to the success of the missionary enterprise as here boldly outlined is not more fully recognized, unless, indeed, we are going to be content with the same dubious sort of success in Christianizing the pagan nations that has marked the efforts of a divided and disorganized Church in America.

Religious Reality. A Book for Men. By the Rev. A. E. J. Rawlinson. With the Preface by the Bishop of Lichfield. Longmans, Green & Co. London and New York. Pp. 183. $1.50.

The author tells us that this book grew out of his experience in preparing men for confirmation. He has tried to tell in simple and untechnical language what plain men need to know about the Christian faith and the practice of it and the maintenance of the Christian life. The ideal is most excellent and the author has made a worthy effort to attain it. The subjects treated and their arrangement seem to us to be good and well proportioned and their presentation sound and practical, but a little too long and heavy for the average man. To the layman, however, who wishes to know enough about theology to repeat his creed understandingly, to live it intelligently and to use the means of grace worthily, who has access to few books, but is willing to study one diligently and with purpose, we can commend this as well suited to his needs.

Lectures on the Incarnation of God. By E. L. Strong, M. A., Priest of the Oxford Mission Brotherhood of the Epiphany, Calcutta. Longmans, Green & Co. London and New York. Pp. 320. $1.75.

These lectures were originally delivered to a Sisterhood, corresponding to the Brotherhood to which the lecturer belongs. Christology or that department of theology which has to do with the central division of the Creed, is the subject, and the matter is drawn almost exclusively from a close and exhaustive study of the New Testament passages bearing upon the incarnation, atonement, resurrection, ascension, priesthood, etc., of our Divine Lord. The tone of the book is spiritual and devout without being mawkish, its teachings positive, clear and evangelical. A good book especially for the class of students for which it is designed.

On the Way to Jerusalem With the Tenth Crusade. The Church Missions Publishing Co., Hartford, Conn.

This little pamphlet is somewhat cumbersome as to title, but its contents will repay the earnest reader. By means of sympathetic text and clear-cut photographic illustration it brings vividly to the mind's eye the recent British campaign in the Holy Land. Beersheba, Gaza, Jaffa, Ascalon (names to conjure with!) are treated in turn, and the military operations before each place are effectively sketched in. One reaches the last paragraph with a sense of being much more intimately in touch than before with that portion of the great war map.

The Children's Crusade. By Julia Conover. Published by the same house

In this little Easter play the author has tried, with the aid of young actors, medieval costumes and militant church hymns, to represent the romantic child pilgrimage of the middle ages, but we must confess that the attempt is not markedly successful. The real drama was too tremendous to be handled on such a small scale, and the final effect here is rather crude.

THE ROOTS OF FAITH.

Mr. Editor:

Published in the Contemporary Review, and reprinted in the Living Age of July 20, there is a most interesting, and to some minds I should think a most valuable article on the above subject, the same being an address delivered by Professor David S. Cairns in King's College, London. The purpose of the address is to show that the methods of religious faith and of scientific knowledge are by no means so unlike as many have supposed. "The deep, indeed radical, contrast," he says, "which is often drawn between the procedure of science in solving its particular problems and of faith in attaining its solution of the riddle of the world, seems to me to have been exaggerated in the gravest and most misleading way."

He then goes on to show how the great pioneers in science, after brooding over their data, leap into "the splendor of a sudden thought." Let me quote this interesting bit of testimony which he gives:

"My friend and colleague, the late Principal Lindsay, once told me that Lord Kelvin told him that he never thought his way quite up to any one of his great discoveries. He said that he brooded over the facts, which set him his problem, until there came a moment when his mind made a mortal spring out beyond anything that he or any man could demonstrate. I repeated this story once to two very distinguished biologists, and they said at once that that was how the great discoveries of science were always made, that the end was seen before the means."

All this certainly shows a fundamental likeness to the processes of faith, which is "the whole man acting and discerning at his highest level."

The lecture shows the difference as well as the similarity, the difference lying mainly in this, that science deals with particular problems whereas faith deals with the universal problem. The further difference follows that science dealing with particulars requires specialists, whereas "the genius of faith belongs potentially to every human being."

This brief notice gives but a poor idea of the whole lecture, which is well worth reading. It is a stimulating piece of writing which can be read and pondered many times.

PRAYERS FOR UNITY.

Mr. Editor:

Your editorial, "A Matter for Lay Consideration," in the current number of your esteemed paper, emphasizes the most difficult problem confronting the whole Church today, namely, Church Unity.

As you have pointed out, a result of this war will be a readjustment of the social order. Obviously the Church will have to meet certain demands incident to this readjustment or suffer reproach. I do not believe, however, that she will be "strong enough" to embrace the splendid opportunity that awaits her unless she is "united enough." We may be thankful as the Joint Commission on Christian Unity has said, "The Holy Spirit is turning the mind of Christendom toward reunion." This is of course a hopeful sign. We are beginning "to lay to heart the great dangers we are in by our unhappy divisions." Hatred and prejudice, pride and bigotry, and whatsoever else may hinder us from Godly union and concord must be done away. Viewing this subject from the Anglican standpoint, as some one has aptly expressed it, it will be difficult to convince people that the movement toward unity is not an effort on the part of the Episcopal Church to absorb all the rest, making them Prayer Book Churchmen just like ourselves. The work of other Christian bodies must be acknowledged. There must be a greater manifestation of love and respect for these bodies on the part of all our Church people.

I would respectfully suggest, therefore, that the prayer for the Unity of God's people be said in all our churches at every service as a means of securing God's help and also of keeping this great subject before our people.

S. HILTON ORRICK.

Hagerstown, Md., July 23, 1918.

DR. FREEMAN AT CAMP LEE.

Mr. Editor:

Your readers will be interested in a brief account of the visit to this camp of Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., of Minneapolis, now speaking in the camps on a tour which he is making at the request of the Secretary of War, for the purpose of giving information concerning the war and arousing patriotism and enthusiasm in the hearts of all the soldiers.

Dr. Freeman spoke Sunday night to an audience of about 3,000 men from the West, who are the chosen horsemen of the country, now training in the Veterinary School for duty overseas. The effect of this address, being delivered by a westerner to western men, was very remarkable, producing the widest enthusiasm.

Monday afternoon about 4 o'clock, beneath a broiling sun and to an audience of about 4,000 in the "Development Battalion" seated on a blistering hillside, Dr. Freeman delivered another remarkable address, especially effective in view of the fact that the vast majority of these men were in stages of sickness and physical disability, now undergoing treatment that they may be restored to the fighting forces of the country.

Last evening he delivered a third address to the largest audience ever assembled in Camp Lee; 15,000 officers and men of the Depot Brigade, most of whom were from the last draft recently arrived in Camp Lee. This latter address was delivered under the supervision of General Hedekin, commander of this camp. Dr. Freeman was introduced by Colonel Tayman, who made a very impressive statement as to the purposes of this order from the War Department.

In Dr. Freeman the three great forces of the country are combined; the War Department through the Secretary of War, sending him out with an official endorsement, he being under the direction of the Y. M. C. A. and a member of the War Commission; the State and the Church are most effectively combined in a great man doing a great work, if not the greatest work of its kind being done in the country today.

SOUTHWESTERN MISSIONARY FIELD.

Mr. Editor: To all who are interested in the missionary work of the Church in our own land, I would call attention to a little pamphlet, "A Religious Survey of the Province of the Southwest." It may be had free by addressing the Secretary, Rev. A. N. Hyde, Joplin, Mo. The great opportunities for missionary work of many kinds, among many races, should be more widely known and missionary interest stimulated.

GERMAN ATROCITIES.

Mr. Editor: Please allow to a lifelong reader and almost life-long subscriber a mild criticism of your "Christianity and the Community" columns.

In the paper of some weeks back appeared what Mr. Montague accepted as an "official" report of airplane work on hospitals in rear of allies' line. It was manifestly a "hoax," written by some "Smart Alec," to stir up feeling against the Germans. The Germans may be so cruel, but are not fools enough to make such "official" reports. Again, in this week's issue, the writer speaks with perfect calmness of the need of the "absolute annihilation" of those who hold this theory (the rule of might). This is the language and sentiment of the secular papers now; but should a church paper take the same tone? Surely the feeling against those sinners is strong enough now, and needs not "harking on" by Christians.

BERKELEY MINOR.

PLEA FOR ARMY CHAPLAINS.

By a Former Chaplain.

From patriotic motives in the midst of war and because of the natural repugnance on the parts of clergymen to discuss personal matters when great sacrifices are demanded of all men, the chaplains of the army have refrained from presenting their difficulties and embarrassing hardships and conditions from the Church and the country at large, for this is a time to suffer and endure; and yet a consideration for all concerned demands that Churchmen everywhere should know the conditions under which chaplains are laboring and learn of some remedies and changes which can be secured by civilian influences by which the dignity of the Church and the welfare of her representatives in the army may be improved.

And this discussion of chaplains is most appropriate at this time because the War Department has established the precedent, and in the very crisis of the greatest war in human history has decided to change the insignia of the chaplains and that the chaplains shall be deprived of all marks of official rank, which the experience of the chaplains of long service has demonstrated to have been of the greatest assistance in their work. The insignia of the army chaplain, which has been for years a "cross of silver," because that symbol was objectionable to the few Jewish chaplains recently appointed, is to be supplanted by the "shepherd's crook," the heraldic symbol of a bishop and which will mean nothing compared to the former device of the Christian faith, acceptable to all, but the recently appointed chaplains above mentioned.

Concerning the abolition of all marks of rank, little will be said, except that the army authorities have always been opposed to granting any insignia of rank to any corps or department of non-combatants, although they might share equal dangers and hardships, and the only reason why surgeons, dentists and veterinarians and the field clerks wear the insignia of rank today is because experience having found outward indications of grading absolutely necessary because the army only respects rank, with the dignity of their professions at stake, backed by splendid civilian organizations, they have secured by political and congressional action what the military authorities would never grant and which was so imperative for useful work and essential in the realm of authority and obedience. For so requisite is rank in the regime of the army that it has been granted recently to Bishops, to the Red Cross officials and to Y. M. C. A. workers in France; and will shortly be granted to women nurses, and yet by some deluded reasoning of the inexperienced is not considered necessary for the chaplain, mirabile dictu! But the real cause of these ignominious changes is in the lack of organization among the chaplains, the paucity of interest among Church officials, and the hesitancy of the Church at large to wish to know and do for chaplains and the unfortunate disinclination of the War Department to ask what is desired by the chaplains and rather to tell them what must be borne. The churches everywhere have loyally supported our country, they have inspired the people and encouraged thrift and loans to the Government, everywhere the Church's leaders are in the forefront of each patriotic and moral effort, and yet the representatives of the Church in the army have been neglected in promotion or humiliated by loss of a rank insignia or touched by the quick by the removal of their cross as the token of the chaplaincy of the American army. O tempora! O mores!

But why should the matter of promotion be considered for chaplains at this time? It seems inappropriate at first sight for the Government to have one single additional expense; this is true, and no one will question either the self-sacrifice of the clergy as a class, but ever since 1916 there has been granted extremely rapid promotion for every officer in the army except chaplains, newly instituted corps have been allowed the honor of advancing to the grades of general, and at least to the rank of colonel, which before were only allowed to rise to the grade of lieutenant, and the chaplain's corps has remained the same, the entrance grade has been first lieutenant, where one must remain seven years, and the remainder of service one must be content with a captaincy unless some fortuitous chance will make him one of the elect fifteen majors selected by the President. In other words, as the Act of Congress, 1914, now stands, while all other officers during this war can rise to exalted rank, no matter how noble the services or how efficient the man, the chaplain will remain a lieutenant for seven years, and if the fifteen chaplains major live, no chaplain will be advanced beyond the grade of captain, and the number of majors among the chaplains will remain fifteen, although the number of chaplains has increased to over 1,000 instead of the original sixty-seven. More than this, the Act of 1904 prevents a chaplain from advancing beyond the "selected majority," while surgeons have been allowed not one but many generals, dentists rise to the grade of colonels and veterinarians to that same grade, the argument being that they are professional men and make great sacrifices during the war; and lo! what of chaplains?

The Act of Congress, approved April 21, 1904, must be superseded by new legislation, or else the indignity to the Church must remain. The War Department can do nothing in the face of legislation that exists; the War Department will be glad to assist the chaplains to better things when the law grants them the power, when Congress speaks the voice of the people, when the Churchmen everywhere show their interest, when the honor of the chaplains become the vital problem of each congregation.

The Bishops in Washington, the confederation of Churches' representatives, delay the enactment of this legislation. Why? It is certainly a vital matter. First, it concerns the honor and standing of the Church; second, it affects the welfare and comfort of the clergymen in the field; third, the elevation of the Church's representatives to at least the level of other branches of the service exalts her work in the eyes of officers and men, instead of men asking the question, Why is not our chaplain promoted when he has been so long in the service? Awake the interest of our Church representatives in Washington (they are Bishops Lawrence, Harding and Perry); arouse the interest of each Senator and Congressman in your State; interest your rector and yourself and condense the needs of the chaplain in a simple bill, that will embody the same promotion and the same ratios of promotion by seniority only as is now in effect for the surgeons in the Medical Department of the United States Army. The bill will be easily framed with American religious sentiment endorsing it, and will receive the hearty and undivided sanction of both Houses of Congress and the approval of the President.

BROTHERHOOD WORK IN CAMP.

Few of us have a tangible conception of the life our boys must live in a camp or cantonment. Needless to say, it is all "war first," and every personal consideration must give way to obedience to military requirements.

We know that "speeding up" has been the order of things in all our camps this past six months at least, but one cannot possibly appreciate what that means unless he spends a little while in a camp.

Drill, study, required recreation and minor duties concerning one's personal effects follow one another and interweave with scarcely any cessation; night and day periods set apart for holidays are subject to frequent interruption.

While the military authorities may realize the importance of religious influences, and the work of the Y. M. C. A. visibly flourishes, under the current is the perpetual grind the tendency of which is to distract even the well-meaning soldier, leading him to neglect his personal religious duties.

Total the numbers attending regimental services in almost any camp on Sunday, allowing for attendance at city churches and except in commands where attendance is obligatory, the percentage of those present is much smaller than it should be.

Reasons for this may be readily given, but the point is that there remain large numbers of men who should somehow be related to the available religious influences which even military requirements dare not smother.

The solution of this most important problem is found in personal man-to-man work, and we are thankful to say that the Church is forging ahead in this rich field.

With the hearty approval and financial support of the War Commission of the Church, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, through the special administration of the Army and Navy Department, has been conducting with increasing volume, a great lay-work which is concretely described in the second report of this department.

Arranged according to camps, the work of sixty-eight lay secretaries, co-operating with Camp Civilian Chaplains, is interestingly described and enlivened by letters and comments gleaned from soldiers and others.

One may learn on every page of the great diligence and devotion of these representatives of the Church. The report well says: "To inspire and stir men to accept their Christian obligation to their comrades is the hardest sort of work, and the kind that tries their very souls. The mental strain of it, coupled with the physical work of tramping over the camp on foot in all conditions of weather, is such that only those who have the love of God in their hearts and a burning desire to serve their fellowmen, can find it possible to endure."

The work is constructive and fraternal rather than evangelical, though the Secretary loses no opportunity to sow seed at every step.

Mainly, the endeavor is to search out our Church boys, and incidentally any earnest fellow, and form them into groups for personal influence and service. These men are shown the urgent importance, at this time in particular, of loyalty to their Church and to personal devotions, and of spreading an influence for good throughout their company. Upwards of one thousand such groups have been formed. Over three hundred and fifty men have been led to baptism and confirmation. The head office in Philadelphia receives and sends out an average of five hundred pieces of mail daily. These letters are not only on business with the secretaries and other officers, but every soldier Churchman receives a friendly letter. Thousands of the Soldiers' and Sailors' Prayer Books, furnished through the War Commission and the Pennsylvania Diocesan War Commission, have been distributed.

More than 37,000 names of men of the Church have been carefully catalogued, and are being added to and the list revised and brought up to date day by day. Military information of real value to our Church people is compiled and may be had on request.

It is indeed a large work that is being done, and it deserves increasing support from every parish where boys are entering service from time to time and whose names and military address should be promptly reported.

Address with such names, and for a copy of this interesting report, which is sent free, Army and Navy Department, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Church House, Philadelphia, Pa.

THE NEW SOLDIERY.

Shining through the bitter rain from war clouds, righteousness touches earth with a glorious light while truth sets her crown of power over the allies like a rainbow of promise to the world.

An irresistible divinity has awakened within us. There is within us a power to work out our ideals, and our ideals, caught from the eternities by our far visioned prophets, are the things of the spirit by which worlds are made and universal order is maintained. Neither bondage nor fear confront us as we face things as they are and fight for the things that ought to be. We have seen the vision and cast the vote that barters old worlds for new. Now is the hour not of choice, but of action. All humanity, all nature, God calls each individual to be his greatest and do his best. The greater day will dawn, not for the remaking of the old age, not a reconstruction, but the birthday of a new age. This is the new soldiery, to fight for the things of the spirit and pioneer for the kingdom. Lift up your eyes, behold the angels of God hold aside the curtains of heaven and down to earth comes the age that counts that alone worth while which is of the Spirit. Listen now to the message and meaning of the ages, all ye who are forward-looking and have an upturned face, for your day has come.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

VI. Is There a Dearth of Clergy?

Yes and no. On the one hand, when there are large numbers of vacant parishes and mission stations, when Missionary Bishops especially find it difficult to keep vacant places filled, it would seem as though there must be a great dearth of clergy. On the other hand, when there are many clergy seeking employment, which they do not find, when many are resorting, in part at least, to some secular or semi-secular employment, in order to get a living wage for themselves and their families, these plain facts seem to say "No," that there is not any dearth of clergy.

But it is said, while it is true that there are many unemployed clergy, yet they are not the kind that are needed; that they are not fitted for the positions that are vacant. If this is true, it is a very serious reflection on present conditions. It is then a condition which ought speedily to be remedied.

Examine these conditions. There are in this Church in the United States fully 3,500 clergy who are in ordinary health and vigor and of suitable age to do the ordinary work of a clergyman. They are of different qualifications, but they are capable of filling somewhere some position of some kind. They were ordained to the ministry with this in view; if they were not capable they ought not to have been ordained. Out of over 5,000 clergymen, this number (3,500) is probably a low estimate. Probably 4,000 would be more accurate.

Now while the salaries of some of our clergy are adequate, yet it is not so with all. There are many with whom the salary is insufficient for a man with a family to live in comfort and do his work properly. It may be safely said that there are not more than 3,000 parishes and mission stations where the rector or missionary is so well provided for that he is not hampered by insufficient or uncertain salary for himself and family. In other words, we have over 3,500 qualified clergy, but we have less than 3,000 places where suitable provision is made for their support.

How about the other 500 and more clergy? Many of them are married clergymen.

There are many vacant places. But in a large number of places the Church is weak. In many of these places there are organized parishes. They have wardens and vestry, the same as any strong parish. But these are weak in numbers and weak in finances. They vary in their conditions. But take a sample case, not uncommon. The little parish has fifty communicants. It has been vacant for a time. A rector is called. By making a vigorous effort and raising money in every possible way they promise a salary of five, six or eight hundred dollars. Some missionary board adds a stipend of two or three hundred dollars. The new rector goes to the expense of moving his family there. For a time the work seems to prosper. But very often only a short time. Why? Many reasons arise. Some one moves away, and there is one less good paying member in the parish. Another promised to pay, but fails to do so. Often there is one or perhaps several persons hard to please. Dissatisfaction is easily created. The salary promised was very small, but it will be much smaller if the rector stays. He must join the procession of moving clergy and go elsewhere, take other work if he can find it, or perhaps take secular work and add one more name to the long list of non-parochial clergy. This is no imaginary case, but rather is a sample of hundreds of cases, not all alike, but with varying conditions.

There are large numbers of places where the salary is inadequate for a clergyman with a family. Looked at from the standpoint of proper and sufficient support of the clergy, there is a great overplus of clergy, especially of married clergymen. From this standpoint there certainly is no dearth of clergy. It is said that there is a large and rapid increase in the number of clergy who are secularly employed. It has a harmful effect. In these days of sharp competition, when, to make a parish successful it must excel in every possible way, it becomes a serious hindrance if a clergyman has fallen behind on his part. And secular work is very apt to mar his efficiency. It is the fault of our present system, which has driven many of our clergy to seek secular employment. It is not so much the inadequate salary (though that is often bad enough), but the uncertainty of any tenure of cure—that is the worst of all. The clergy have entered upon what they expected would be a life work in the ministry of the Church. Having families to support, what are they to do? They are the victims of a system that gives them no certainty of adequate support. They drift away from strict and steady employment as clergymen. In time they become more or less unfitted for the best positions as clergymen. Who or what is to blame? It is our present system. When we see where the fault lies—not in the clergy, but in the system under which they work—then we will be better prepared to apply a remedy. It is for the married clergy (but for others, too) that a better system is needed.

The Nation's Angelus.

(A two-minute intercession compiled by the Vicar of the Nativity and the Resurrection Chapels, for use at mid-day, June 23, 1918, and until the end of the war. Approved by the Bishop of Washington.)

"Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace."

We come to Thee for Salvation: for Victory and for Peace, O Lord.

Blessed Saviour, Who at mid-day didst hang upon the Cross, stretching forth Thy loving arms in prayer and sacrifice for us; Grant that all mankind may look unto Thee and be saved. Send Thy blessing upon our Nation, and all our Allies in this time of trial. Guide our spiritual and civil leaders, the Clergy of Thy Church, the President of the United States and all others in authority. Protect and strengthen our soldiers and sailors, our aviators and marines, wherever they may be (especially those who have gone forth from our own congregation); help them to pray and to be faithful. Comfort the sick, the wounded and the prisoners. Show mercy to the dying. Succour the bereaved and those in want. Send sufficient food. Prosper our schools and industries. Sustain our war-workers. Help us all at home, and at the front, to be unselfish, to do our full duty, and to win a sure victory for freedom, righteousness and true religion. Finally, we beseech Thee, Grant to the whole world salvation and peace, through Thy mercies and merits, Who livest and reignest with the Father and the Holy Ghost ever one God, world without end. Amen.

Our Father, Who art in heaven, Hallowed be Thy Name. Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth. * * *

The Great Commission

ANXIOUS DAYS AT FORT YUKON.

By the Rev. Hudson Stuck, D. D., Archdeacon of the Yukon.

Last autumn I wrote an article on the many reasons we in Fort Yukon had for being grateful to God and to our friends "outside." Now I must write about present anxieties, confident that when once they are known we shall have new cause for thankfulness.

When I was arranging for my prolonged absence last winter, I knew that my "specials" were well-nigh exhausted, and that upon my return to Fort Yukon I should be confronted with expenditures for St. Stephen's Hospital that I should have to find the funds for. A number of absolutely necessary things had been done that were not paid for.

The Board of Missions appropriates $1,600 for the maintenance of this institution, besides paying salaries of $3,600 for the physician, two nurses and an orderly. It is not enough, and the balance must be met out of "specials."

It is very hard to say, as yet, just what the cost of maintaining the hospital year by year will be. In all probability it will vary from year to year, for one may hardly expect that the amount of sickness and the number of patients will be constant. In 1916 (and the hospital was open only half of that year) we had several white patients who were able to pay for their care. In 1917 we had none.

Virtually the whole of the appropriation for maintenance is expended upon the food supplies and freight thereon. There remain all sorts of expenses for which there is no regular provision—for which I am under the necessity of providing as best I can.

The excessive consumption of wood without adequate warming of the hospital in the winter of 1916-17 called for the thorough chinking and plastering of the chinks of the whole building. Last fall I bought bale after bale of oakum at my personal cost (and at a very great advance) and employed a man to do the work. It was well done. Last winter was the severest of any of which record has been kept here. Yet the hospital was always comfortable in temperature (I am assured), and the consumption of wood was considerably less. The cost of the chinking, save a small part which was the working out of a bill for doctor's services, stands charged against the hospital on the local trader's books.

Soon after my return from the winter journey on the Arctic coast an incident happened that involved the completion of the job and an additional expense. I knew that the mere forcing of oakum between the joints of the logs was not enough—the joints themselves should be plastered or cemented—but I had withheld the authorizing of it until I should have the funds. Then a child patient, playing out in the sunshine (as we keep them whenever possible) struck a match and set it (accidentally or otherwise I know not) against one of the oakum-filled joints of the logs. Poof!—the oakum blazed up and ignited in a moment the oakum in the other joints up to the top of the wall, and I realized the danger of leaving the building thus. One "Pyrene" extinguisher sufficed to smother the smoldering stuff, but I could take no such chances again, and the whole building is now cemented over every oakum-filled chink. It adds to the warmth; adds, I think, to the appearance, and adds $50 to the bills payable.

Here is another thing, the break up of the Yukon at the end of May was accompanied by floods all over the interior. At Circle City the town was under water, the people fled to the hills, and the wireless telegraph installation was destroyed. While the water was at its highest and the Yukon bank full, there arose a gale from the south which drove waves against the bank for two or three days, and when the wind fell and the water subsided we had lost full ten feet of bank. This left our store-house so close to the bank that I felt it must be moved again. If the current has changed, as we all hope, the store-house might stand there for a year or two. If the cutting be resumed it would have to be moved at once. Now the store-house is comparatively empty at present. In a few weeks it will be full of next year's supplies. All those here who were asked to bid on its removal refused to give any price for moving it as it stood. The sills are rotten and would not stand the strain. We cannot merely move it back; that would bring it too close to the hospital for fire safety. It must be moved behind the present hospital building to a permanent place. What would you do under the circumstances? I wish those who read this could have some experience of the anxious responsibility of such decisions.

I got bids for tearing it down, removing the material to the new site, driving piles to build it on, rebuilding it and repainting it, and the lowest bid was $350. I bade the man go ahead, and the work is doing as I write. I wonder what you would have done.

I need $1,000 to meet obligations already incurred, of which these are samples. We should have at least $200 a year to keep the hospital in repair and to replace things worn out. Besides, we need at least another $1,000 for running expenses and new emergencies. So there is $2,200 I must find somehow. Must I come out again and appeal for "specials"? I don't want to.

Will the many friends of Bishop Rowe, who have already done so much for Fort Yukon, help us to meet these emergencies? Gifts may be sent to Mr. John W. Wood, Foreign Secretary of the Board of Missions, at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York. They should of course be marked "Special for Fort Yukon." Mr. Wood was here with us last summer, knows the situation and would doubtless be willing to answer any questions or give further information.

From Nevada.

Bishop Hunting has just returned from a two-thousand-mile motor car trip through Nevada. In the course of it he almost completely wore out the episcopal automobile.

"I had a strenuous trip," he says, "but got through without more than average mishaps. I went into every county in the State. I visited some places where no clergyman of this Church had ever been. I could not rest content until I knew conditions. It is a comfort to be able to write that there is not a place where we have as many as three communicants which is not cared for after a fashion by our nine men. I do not know of a community where we are missing a real opportunity. There are places where no religious services of any sort are ever held. Of course, the souls in these towns should be cared for. Some of them are almost as virgin fields as the foreign field. If I could get three men I could pay them, rearrange my groups of missions and go into some of these new places. No communicants here are neglected or forgotten. I get around to them, if no one else does. This especially applies to isolated ranches.

The Board of Missions is mighty good to Nevada. All we can do is to keep at work here, planting and watering. There will be a harvest some day. I honestly believe the Board's expenditures will be fully justified. I am sure not a penny of Board money is wasted, and we get the people to do all possible."

Dr. John W. Wood Will Visit the Orient.

In response to repeated requests from the Bishops and Missionaries in the Orient, Mr. John W. Wood, Foreign Secretary of the Board of Missions, expects to spend next autumn and winter in visiting the far eastern mission fields. Sailing from San Francisco early in October, he will first visit in the Hawaiian Islands, then spend about two months in Japan. From there his itinerary takes him south to the Philippines for January and February of 1919. March, April and May will be spent in China. After a visit to the Church of England Missions in Peking neighborhood and Korea, Mr. Wood expects to return to Japan and sail from Yokohama early in June, 1919.

Teachers Wanted at Honolulu.

Bishop Restarick telegraphs the Board of Missions that Iolani School at Honolulu needs quickly three additional men teachers. They should be unmarried and not subject to the conscriptive service law. They should be college graduates preferably, and at least graduates of high and normal schools of excellent standing. At Bishop Restarick's request, I will take pleasure in endeavoring to supply additional particulars.

Geneva Summer Conference: Province of New York and New Jersey.

In spite of increased railroad fares and the conflict of duties arising from war service, the enrollment at the Conference of the Second Province at Hobart College, Geneva, N. Y., was two hundred and thirty-three. Although this number was not quite as large as last year, it was very noticeable that more of the delegates arrived on the first night and stayed to the end of the conference than ever before. In other words, a greater spirit of seriousness animated the students than in other years; there was little visiting from class to class; and those enrolled were more ready than formerly to take the examination at the end of the courses. There was plenty of fun, too. An unusually active recreation committee saw to that. There were walks—a bird walk and a star walk—under the guidance of the college professors. There was a field day on the Fourth of July, and a tea at the country club on Saturday afternoon, besides other events that sent "Jack" back to his work better for the play he had taken.

The most picturesque feature of the conference, and that which drew outsiders by the automobile load, was the mystery play given out of doors under the great trees on William Smith campus. "The Great Trail," an Indian mystery play written by Mrs. Henry L. Hobart five years ago, was chosen for this year's conference play. The same spirit of deep reverence and desire to teach the Church's lesson, marked the sixty players who took part in the performance. This particular mystery play is especially well adapted to out-of-door production. There are many who feel that the mystery play is the outstanding event on the conference program and that which seems to sum up all the other lessons and impressions of the ten days.

The classes were as usual interesting and well attended. Miss Grace Lindley gave a preparation course for the Advent Call. Dr. Gray and Mrs. Brewster taught Bishop Burleson's new book for seniors and intermediates. For the junior course Dr. Gray had a real clinic, eight or ten little boys and girls to whom the members of his class told the stories in Miss Giles' book. In Social Service there were more students enrolled than ever before. Canon Elmendorf had a course on War Time Ministries of the Church. Mr. Crouch one on After War Problems, and Dr. Tyler one on the Spiritual Note in Social Service. Miss Withers, Dr. Boynton and Dr. Bradner taught the courses in religious education.

A special feature was the course for the Daughters of the King and the Girls' Friendly, taught by the Rev. Dr. Ferris, of Rochester. There was a Daughters of the King day, and a Girls' Friendly Society day with conferences led by the Rev. Frank Nelson, of Cincinnati.

Bishop Stearly, president of the conference, was again in charge of the Sunset Services and preached daily. The high water mark of the conference was of course the Corporate Communion on Sunday morning and the preparation for it the evening before.

The same officers were re-elected for 1919, with the exception that the Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin was elected Treasurer and Mr. Kingman N. Robins Chairman of the Finance Committee, which was merely an exchange on their part of the offices they held last year. The report of the Finance Committee showed that three dioceses in the province had paid or overpaid their share of the conference expenses—namely, Albany, Newark and Western New York.

Government Supervision of Missionary Remittances: It is not generally known that the government has taken notice of money sent out of the country by the missionary societies, and some time since formed a bureau to supervise it. Some friction arose, due to alleged interference with regular appropriations, when it was only special outlays that were intended to be guarded. An expert was stationed in Washington, and he has succeeded in getting a working understanding between government and societies. Special gifts, like the Syrian Relief, are reported. The amount annually sent out of the country to missions is about $21,000,000, but this year $2,000,000 extra is allowed, owing to high rates of exchange. All American missionary societies maintaining work in foreign lands are complying strictly with government regulations, and in some instances are governing their appeals to churches upon conditions laid down at Washington.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

From the Bishop.

To the Clergy and Laity of the Diocese of Virginia:

Brethren: The Committee of the American Episcopal Church on World Conference on Faith and Order request that we observe the octave January 18-25 of prayer for the visible reunion of the Church.

This period was observed in 1918 in every part of the world and the Commission requests that the same period be observed in 1919 for the same purpose.

I join my request to the request of the Commission and leave the matter in your hands.

Yours faithfully,

ROBT. A. GIBSON.

To the Several Congregations of the Diocese of Virginia:

The Brotherhood of St. Andrew requests that the names of the men who have lately been drafted from each congregation be sent to the headquarters of the Brotherhood, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia, Pa.

I called attention to the importance of this enrollment some time ago and I very earnestly trust the matter will be attended to in each congregation. It is not a burdensome task for most rectors, wardens or committees, and it will be a great misfortune if there are any omissions.

Yours faithfully,

ROBT. A. GIBSON.

Culpeper: On the ninth Sunday after Trinity, in St. Stephen's Church, Culpeper, the rector dedicated a memorial window to Mr. and Mrs. L. P. Nelson, preaching the sermon on "The Experienced Believer." The memorial windows in the church represent events in our Lord's life in their historical order from His nativity to (at present) a scene from the forty days. This new one in the east wall of the church, and behind the pulpit, presents Christ as the Preacher from the fisherman's boat on the Galilean lake, and finds its due place among the scenes of His manhood. Seated in the boat's bow (Matt. 13:2), He is skilfully represented by the artist as speaking with force and effect to an unseen congregation on the shore. Sky and water form a fit frame, and a part of the boat's sail appears like a canopy above His head.

The window, a gift of the children of Mr. and Mrs. Nelson, is from the studio of Messrs. J. & R. Lamb, of New York, and bears this inscription:

In Loving Memory of Our Parents,

Lewis Porter Nelson,

Aug. 20, 1906;

Mary Elizabeth Nelson,

Feb. 18, 1917.

For long years he was an interested and capable vestryman in the parish; and his wife a "mother in Israel," an inspiration to each pastor, and devout and constant worshipper and worker in the church where she was confirmed in 1855, married in 1857, and from which she was laid to rest in 1917.

The Rev. Albert E. Clay, rector of the Church of the Redemption, Philadelphia, exchanged with the rector of St. Stephen's, and preached there and in Little Fork Colonial Church on the seventh and eighth Sundays after Trinity.

St. Peter's Church, New Kent: Interesting services at old St. Peter's Church, New Kent County, which is at present without an organized congregation, have been held on several occasions this summer by the choir of St. Mark's Church, Richmond, under the direction of Mr. J. Parker Dashiell, the choir director. Automobiles sufficient to carry ten or twelve of the choir have been secured on each occasion, and one of the ministers of the city to conduct the service and preach. The services have been greatly appreciated by the people of the community, and at the service last Sunday, when Rev. Dr. Downman, of All Saints' Church, preached and administered the Holy Communion, the church was crowded.

St. Peter's, which was built in 1703, is the oldest church in the vicinity of Richmond. It has been without a rector for several years, and the congregation has been much scattered through deaths and removals. Occasional services are being given to it by the Rev. T. H. Lacy, D. D., missionary to churches in King William and Goochland Counties.

St. Thomas' Church, Orange: The Rev. Thomas Semmes, of Meade Memorial Church, South Richmond, has been called to the rectorship of this parish and also to be chaplain of Woodberry Forest School, a few miles distant. His decision has not yet been announced.

St. Paul's Church, Alexandria: A celebration of the Holy Communion, with special intercessory prayer for all the men from the congregation who have been called to the colors, was held in this church on Friday evening, July 26.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Ordination.

At Galilee Church, Virginia Beach, on the eighth Sunday after Trinity, July 21, Mr. Francis Bland Tucker, youngest son of the Right Rev. Beverly D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop of the Diocese, was ordained to the diaconate by his father. Mr. Tucker was presented by his cousin, the Rev. J. Hubbard Lloyd, missionary to Japan. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Luke M. White, rector of St. Luke's Church, Montclair, N. J., a brother-in-law of the candidate. The Rev. E. P. Minor, rector of the church, assisted in the services. The newly ordained deacon is a private in the national service.

It is worthy of note that Bishop Tucker now has four sons and a son-in-law in the ministry of the Church, one being the Missionary Bishop of Kyoto, Japan. Another son, Dr. Augustine Tucker, who married a daughter of Bishop Cheshire, is a medical missionary in China. Five of the Bishop's sons are serving in the army, of whom three are clergymen. One is already in France.

Bishop Theodore I. Reese, of Southern Ohio, who has succeeded Bishop Perry as Vice-Chairman of the Church War Commission, visited the various cantonments in the Diocese with Bishop Tucker last week. Tuesday was spent at Camp Lee, under the guidance of the Rev. Robert B. Nelson and Mr. Knapp. A ministerial alliance of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew workers, the Army and the Civilian Chaplains was formed. On Wednesday the Chaplains visited Camps Stuart, Hill and Eustace, on the Peninsula, between Fort Monroe and Lee Hall, and conferred as to the Church's work with the Rev. Mr. Lane, Archdeacon Rich and Mr. Brown, of the Brotherhood.

The work of the volunteer chaplains and representatives of the Brotherhood in these camps has been attended with gratifying results.

WASHINGTON.

Rt. Rev. A. Harding, D. D., Bishop.

Dr. John Latane Lewis, a prominent physician and Churchman of Bethesda, Md., died suddenly at his home in that place July 3, aged fifty-two years. He was a brother of the Rev. Thomas D. Lewis, of Sweetbriar, Va.

Though endowed with an unusually strong physique, he had given himself so fully and freely to all who needed him, especially since the war began, that he literally gave his life for others. He died from heart failure brought on from overwork.

Few men in the three score and ten years allotted to man have ever crowded so many deeds of helpfulness, of gentleness and kindness into their lives as he did into his fifty years.

In a memorial sermon his rector, the Rev. James Kirkpatrick, said of him:

"His last great work was in connection with the Red Cross which he organized in this district and helped to carry forward to real success. Many interests and labors, besides the extra work which the war imposed on him as a doctor, brought a sudden end to his life's work. As much as we feel our loss and sorrow at his departing, we rejoice that he has lived greatly a true and noble Christian life.

"He entered life blessed with the rich heritage of a great ancestry whose ideals came to them from the Bible and the Book of Common Prayer. He has handed on this trust unsullied to the generations that come after."

MARYLAND.

Rt. Rev. J. G. Murray, D. D., Bishop.

Parting Word to Soldiers in Christ Church, Baltimore.

Sunday afternoon, July 28, the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., who in co-operation with the people of Christ Church inaugurated the patriotic services in Christ Church last autumn, gave his parting word to the men in uniform gathered in the church, before his departure for another field. Since last November, when these services started, hundreds of men in uniform have been regularly attending them and have enjoyed the suppers and entertainment which the ladies of Christ Church have provided for them in the parish house. During the summer months, under the supervision of Mr. and Mrs. William O. Edmonston, the suppers have been continued on the church lawn after the brief service in the church. These services and suppers will continue.

MISSISSIPPI.

Rt. Rev. T. DuB. Bratton, D. D., Bishop.

Election Declined.

The Rev. William Mercer Green, recently elected Bishop-Coadjutor of the Diocese, has written to Bishop Bratton declining the election on account of a technical flaw in the balloting. The constitution of the Diocese requires that unless two-thirds of both clergy and parishes entitled to vote at such an election are present and voting, a two-thirds majority in both orders is necessary to a choice. When the balloting began the tellers showed two-thirds of the parishes voting, and the Bishop declared a simple majority was sufficient for an election. After adjournment, however, it was discovered that but twenty-one out of the thirty-three parishes were represented, which seemed to establish the fact that an error had innocently been made. Though the Chancellor of the Diocese ruled that the action of the Council was final and valid, Mr. Green is unwilling to accept an election on which a shadow of suspicion of illegality exists.

GEORGIA.

Rt. Rev. F. F. Reese, D. D., Bishop.

Cordele: On Sunday, July 21, a very impressive service was held in Christ Church, Rev. W. B. Sams, vicar, at which time a silk Service Flag and a United States Flag were unveiled in honor of the four men who have gone from this little congregation into the army. The flags were unveiled immediately after the regular morning service had been said. The sermon was preached by the Rev. John Moore Walker, of St. Paul's Church, Albany, he being the former rector of Christ Church and was in charge of this church when these men entered the service. The Honor Roll was read by the vicar and special prayers were read.

Rev. W. B. Sams, of Christ Church, Cordele, has been requested by the Bishop of the Diocese to serve as Archdeacon of the Albany Archdeaconry during the absence of Archdeacon Lawrence, who is engaged in the Y. M. C. A. work in France during the war.

LOUISIANA.

Rt. Rev. Davis Sessums, D. D., Bishop.

Diocesan Notes of Interest.

Commencing July 21, Dr. Albert Martin, rector of Trinity Church, Yazoo City, Miss., will have charge for four weeks of Christ Church Cathedral, New Orleans, while the Dean, the Ven. William A. Barr, is taking a vacation in the mountains of North Carolina. Trinity Church in Yazoo City will be closed during that time, but Dr. Martin will continue his duties as editor of Church News, a publication issued for the Diocese of Mississippi.

Rev. Clarence P. Parker, rector of St. Johns', Fort Smith, Ark., will have charge of St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, during the month of August, while the rector, Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley, is taking his vacation.

Rev. J. H. S. Dixon, rector of St. Paul's, Orange, Tex., will be in charge of St. George's Church, New Orleans, for the month of August, during the absence of its rector, Rev. Menard Doswell, Jr.

Rev. Dr. W. B. Capers, formerly President of Columbia Institute, Columbia, Tenn., is in charge of Trinity Church, New Orleans, during the year's leave of absence granted Rev. Dr. Robert S. Coupland, who is now serving as Chaplain "Somewhere in France."

Rev. W. S. Cooper, formerly of Guatemala City, is conducting the missions at Crowley, Washington, Opelousas and Eunice.

Rev. H. M. Green is at present filling the vacancy as rector of Christ Church, Covington, occasioned by the death of Rev. E. A. Rennie.

Rev. Joseph H. Spearing has taken charge of St. James' Church, Baton Rouge, during the absence of Rev. J.

G. Buskie, now serving in the United States Army as Chaplain at Camp Beauregard.

During the month of July a Vacation Bible School was conducted in the parish house of St. Paul's, New Orleans, each week day, Saturdays excepted, from 9 A. M. to 12 noon, in charge of Rev. Alfred R. Berkeley. Quite a number of children attended and were given Bible lessons, the boys also receiving instructions in fish net making, carpentry, basket making, etc., and the girls in sewing, knitting, etc. The younger children were taken charge of by the kindergarten department. This is the first year this school has been attempted, and St. Paul's parish being located in the neighborhood of many poor people, it is hoped the school will grow and fill a great need. While the attendance this year was not very large, the rector feels much encouraged at the start made and plans for greater work next year.

NEW JERSEY.

Rt. Rev. Paul Matthews, D. D., Bishop.

Ordination.

On St. James' Day, in Trinity Church, Vineland, the Bishop of New Jersey officiating, the Rev. Wilson S. Hartzel, formerly a minister of the Dutch Reformed Church, recently exercising the office of a deacon in this Diocese, was advanced to the Priesthood of the Church.

The candidate was presented by the Rev. Francis Van R. Moore, rector of Vineland. The preacher was the Rev. Elliston J. Perot, of Salem.

Mr. Hartzel will continue as priest in charge of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Atlantic City, where he has recently been working, in succession to the late Rev. William E. Allen. This mission is in the neighborhood of the permanent population of the city, as is St. Augustine's also, on Arctic Avenue, under the Rev. James N. Deaver, ministers to the permanent colored population. Both works therefore are of the utmost importance, and give promise of lasting growth and strength.

PITTSBURGH.

Rt. Rev. C. Whitehead, D. D., Bishop.

Charitable Bequests: By the will of the late Miss Christina Kerfoot, daughter of the late Rt. Rev. John Barrett Kerfoot, D. D., first Bishop of Pittsburgh, the following bequests are made to charitable and religious institutions:

To the Board of Trustees of the Diocese of Pittsburgh, her home on Aiken Avenue, to be sold or used as the Board and the Bishop of the Diocese may deem best. This gift was made in grateful recognition of the kindness of the Diocese in providing a home for the widow and children of the Bishop upon his death.

Two trust funds were created, one of $4,000 and the other of $3,000, the interest to be paid to individual beneficiaries, and at their death the principal to go to the General Clergy Relief Fund, in memory of Mrs. Eliza Kerfoot and Miss Katherine Kerfoot, mother and sister of Miss Kerfoot.

A bequest of $3,000 is made to the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, of which Miss Kerfoot was a member, $2,000 for the Endowment Fund and $1,000 for the Altar Society.

Bequests of $1,000 each were made to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, to the Diocesan Missionary Board, to the Diocesan Episcopal Church Home, to the Diocesan Prayer Book Society, and to the Pittsburgh Hospital for Children, and to the Rev.

Dr. John P. Norman, who had been a most intimate and devoted friend of Bishop Kerfoot.

Bequests of $1,000 each were made to the rector, wardens and vestry of Trinity Church, New York, for the upkeep of the burial plot in Trinity Churchyard of Abel T. Anderson, Miss Kerfoot's maternal grandfather; and to the Trustees of the Diocese of Pittsburgh for the care of the burial plot in Homewood Cemetery, where Bishop Kerfoot and family are buried. The will also directs that the unused portion of this large lot is to be used for the graves of worthy ministers not otherwise provided for, or for needy strangers, under the direction and at the discretion of the Board of Trustees. The residue of the property of the testatrix was given to relatives and personal friends.

In Grace Church, Pittsburgh, on Sunday morning, July 14th, a large congregation was present to witness the dedicating of a silk Church Flag, a memorial gift of the Junior Warden and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Ashford, Jr., for their young son, departed. The rector, the Rev. William Porkess, preached a special sermon on the significance of the two flags, the Church and the National.

NEW YORK.

Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D. D., Bishop.
Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D. D., Suffragan.

Old Trinity: On Sunday, August 4th, there will be a special service in Old Trinity Church, Broadway and Wall Street, at 11 o'clock to commemorate the day of Great Britain's entrance into the war. Members of the various British Societies in the city and the public generally are invited to attend.

The British Flag will be carried in procession with the Stars and Stripes, and the National Anthems of America and Great Britain will be sung.

Thanksgivings will be offered for the recent victories with prayers that they may lead on speedily to further and final victory.

The Rev. Dr. Manning, now serving as Chaplain at Camp Upton, will come in from the camp to preach the sermon.

Services commemorating this important day will be held at St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey and all over England. At Westminster the King and Queen with the members of Parliament will go to the service in procession.

The special preacher this year at Trinity Church at the Sunday morning services during August will be the Rev. Leicester C. Lewis, of Chicago. Mr. Lewis is professor at the Western Theological Seminary. His sermons at Trinity Church during the summer season last year were much appreciated and aroused unusual interest.

Australian Soldiers Confirmed.

Four hundred Anzac soldiers, awaiting transportation to the battle front, lent color to two church services in New York Sunday morning, July 28, arriving in church parade formation. One detachment of two hundred stopped at Trinity Church, and the remainder of the group continued on to old St. Peter's Church, in Barclay Street. In Trinity Church Chaplain Cook, Australian, of the transport "Richmond," preached in the morning, and in the afternoon Bishop Burch confirmed twenty-six men in uniform, presented by the chaplain from among members of the ship's enlisted men. Australian troops are being brought in numbers across the Pacific, through the Panama Canal and to New York. The same vessel conveys the men all the way from Sydney to the French or English port. From New York the Australian transports are conveyed by the same warships that convey American transports. This is a main reason why England brings these colonials eastward around the world, rather than westward through the Suez.

NORTH DAKOTA.

Rt. Rev. J. P. Tyler, D. D., Bishop.

Convocation.

The thirty-fourth annual Convocation of the District met in Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, June 2-4. The principal service on the first day (Sunday) was the ordination to the Diaconate of Mr. A. H. Beer, who comes to us from the Methodists, and Mr. H. T. Sockett, who comes from the Presbyterians. The ordination sermon was preached by Rev. C. E. Haupt, of St. Matthew's Church, St. Paul.

The Bishop's annual address dealt mainly with the progress and opportunities of the Church in the District, commending particularly the activities of the clergy in all branches of war work and the women of the Church for their conspicuous leadership in all communities in the State in Red Cross work.

The first business session was held on Monday morning. The permanent officers of convocation were elected as follows: Treasurer, Mr. C. D. Lord; Secretary, Rev. L. G. Moultrie, Valley City; Chancellor, Mr. D. B. Holt, Fargo. The reports of the various standing committees occupied all of the forenoon.

In the afternoon the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary and Guilds was held, Mrs. George Hancock, who has been District President of this organization for many years, presiding.

The annual meeting and banquet of the Laymen's Association was held on Monday evening, which consisted mainly in bidding farewell to Dean Henry F. Kloman, who leaves immediately for work as Chaplain of the Red Cross in France.

The following were elected as delegates to the Provincial Synod to be held in Denver next October: Rev. J. S. Brayfield, Rev. George Buzzelle, Rev. C. H. Brown, Rev. A. E. H. Martyr, Lay: Messrs. J. S. Frame, Judge Barnett, C. D. Lord and A. M. Powell.

The report of the Church Hall showed a full attendance, with year closing with no deficit. Committee on Budget included an item setting aside $450 for payment of indebtedness on Bishop's house. Delegates were elected to attend the separate Indian Convocation to be held late in June at Cannon Ball. Fargo was by vote made the permanent meeting place of convocation, except when by unanimous vote in any year it is decided to go elsewhere.

Gethsemane Cathedral Guild served lunch each day in the crypt, and on Monday evening was host at a delightfully informal reception held in the same place. Early service was held each morning at 7:30, with good attendance.

A telegram of greeting was sent to the President, voicing the loyalty of the Church in North Dakota, to which the following reply was sent by the President:

"Dear Bishop Tyler:

"I am very much obliged for your kind telegram of the 4th of June, and very grateful to you and to the Protestant Episcopal ministers of North Dakota for your co-operation and your prayers. Please accept for yourself and for all those concerned an expression of my deep appreciation and hearty thanks.

"Sincerely and cordially yours,
"WOODROW WILSON."

Personal Notes

The Rev. E. N. Joyner, of Lenoir, N. C., will spend the months of August and September at Rosborough Settlement. His address will be Edgemont, N. C.

The Rev. A. R. Berkeley, of St. Paul's Church, New Orleans, will be in Saluda, N. C., for some time during the summer. During his absence the Rev. C. P. Parker, of Fort Smith, Ark., will have charge of St. Paul's parish.

The Rev. J. D. Miller takes charge of St. Michael's and All Angel's Church, Savannah, Ga., the first of August. He should be addressed at 1021 East Henry Street, instead of Greensborough, N. C.

The Rev. E. S. Pearce, of Rome, N. Y., will spend the month of August at Westport, Conn.

The address of the Rev. W. M. Washington is changed from Port Huron, Mich., to 167 West Pike Street, Ton-ti-ach, Mich.

The Rev. W. Strother Jones, D. D., assistant minister of St. Thomas Church, New York, on account of impaired health, is taking a much needed rest. His present address is 611 Prince Street, Alexandria, Virginia.

The marriage of the Rev. R. Marshall Harrison, D. D., rector of St. Paul's Church, Bellingham, Wash., to Miss Ella A. Wilkinson, superintendent of St. Luke's Hospital, of the same city—a parochial institution—was solemnized on Tuesday, June 25, at Trinity Church, Everett, Wash. The Rev. Edgar M. Rodgers, rector, officiated, in the unavoidable absence of Bishop Keator. Three days after the ceremony, Dr. Harrison underwent a major operation, from which he is making an unusually rapid recovery. He expects to resume his parish work on September 1.

The Rev. Herbert Hawkins, who has been elected canon of Grace Cathedral, Topeka, Kansas, will have charge of the services at the Cathedral during Dean Kayes' absence. He will also continue as the Bishop's Secretary for the present.

The Rev. Fremont N. Hinkel has entered upon his work as assistant minister at St. Margaret's parish, Washington, D. C.

The Rev. Joseph T. Ware has accepted the call to the rectorship of St. Andrew's Church, Birmingham, Alabama.

The Rev. Alan S. Hawksworth has been elected assistant minister of St. Thomas parish, Washington, D. C.

The Rev. J. E. Thompson is in charge of the work at Burlington, Williamsburg, and Iola, Kansas, with residence at Iola.

During the absence of the Dean, the services at Trinity Cathedral, Little Rock, Ark., will be in charge of the Rev. Dr. Verne Stover, who is special ward visitor for the Base Hospital at Camp Pike.

The Rev. Wallace A. Williams, Ph. D., Archdeacon of the District of North Texas, has gone to Camp Taylor, Louisville, Ky., for special training at the School for Chaplains.

Ordinations.

In All Saints' Chapel, Sewanee, Tenn., on June 12, Bishop Guerry, of South Carolina, ordained to the diaconate Messrs. Andrew P. Magwood and Joseph Rogers Walker, presented by Dr. Charles L. Wells, of the University of the South. Bishop Gallor preached the sermon, and the Rt. Rev. A. W. Knight, D. D., read the Litany. For the present Mr. Magwood will work in Douglas, Arizona, and Mr. Walker has been called to St. Timothy's Church, Columbia, S. C.

In St. James Church, Drifton, Pa., on Sunday, July 7, Bishop Talbot advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Ralph A. Weatherly, presented by the Rev. Guy H. Madera. The Rev. James P. Ware, rector of the parish, preached the sermon.

In Grace Cathedral, Topeka, Kans., on June 26, Bishop Wise ordained deacon Mr. George Robinson Hiatt, presented by the Rev. F. F. Busch. The sermon was preached by the Rev. J. P. de B. Kaye, Dean of the Cathedral. Mr. Hiatt, who is a graduate of the University of Kansas, and the Virginia Theological Seminary, becomes a member of the Associate Mission and director of studies, having immediate charge of St. Luke's Church, Wamego, and working with the Rev. Mr. Whittle in the Church of the Good Shepherd, North Topeka.

In the Church of the Good Shepherd, Forrest City, Ark., on June 29, Bishop Winchester advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Jerry Wallace, who was presented by the Rev. C. C. Burke. The sermon was preached by the Rev. C. F. Collins.

The Prevnting Spirit: I used to think of the missionary going and taking the Spirit with him where he went. Now I think of the Spirit as being already there, and inviting the missionary to come and join Him in the work. The Spirit was in China before I was born, and He brought me in to be a co-worker with Himself. And so everywhere and always. What would become of the world but for the presence of the Divine Spirit in it? People seem to think that the heathen world has been without God all these centuries. The heathen, it is true, have not known God, but God has known them all the time. The measure of man's knowledge of God is not the measure of what God is to men. If God had not been in China, China would have been a hell. What keeps a man from becoming a demon? Is it not the presence of the Spirit in his soul? I have had more tenderness of soul in dealing with men ever since this truth has been brought home to me by God's Spirit. How thankful we ought to be that hard theological views and dogmas are giving way, and that the Spirit of Christ is coming in and quietly taking their place.—Griffith John.

SHALL WE HAVE COAL?

In these columns we have quoted shipbuilders on the advantage of prohibition to ship construction.

We have quoted doctors to prove the great benefit of prohibition to the body.

This week we shall quote largely from the Literary Digest of July 27, and the authorities therein cited.

This magazine says in an article that is very conclusively affirmative on this subject:

"In the statement of the National Coal Association we read that 'the drinking evil has become so rampant in the mining communities that its complete elimination is fundamentally necessary in the effort to speed up the mines to get the 100,000,000 additional tons of coal this country will require this year.

"A Washington correspondent of the New York Tribune relates that the riotous prosperity of war time has made saloons and drinking clubs and associations abound in the mining districts.

"He says, 'The coal miners of America are to-day exhibiting only sixty per cent of an easily attained degree of efficiency. Some are making as high as $300 and $500 a month.

"The saloons have gathered around the homes of these sons of good fortune like flies around a molasses barrel.

"The country is paying big money for coal, but the result is that the liquor dealer gets the money and the country doesn't get the coal.'

"Labor leaders in the dry States were asked by the Literary Digest early this year, whether prohibition has been of benefit to labor and whether the workers favor it.

"Out of sixty-two replies received, forty-six answered these questions in the affirmative and eleven in the negative."

We are in favor of prohibition because we believe it will eliminate one of the most serious causes of crime, but the time has now come when everybody should advocate this reform for economic and patriotic as well as moral reasons.

There is no text more true than that "The wages of sin is death."

We believe that death here refers to this world and not the next.

It is only in the abnormal times of war that we see this fully illustrated. When large bodies of young men are brought together the ravages of disease caused by immorality is startling.

It is only when the utmost effort is required to produce such a household necessity as coal that we realize the importance of total abstinence.

A New Profession for Women.

Miss Jessie H. Bancroft has organized what is likely to prove a very extensive and profitable profession for women educated in domestic science and dietics; that is the preparing and delivery of ready cooked meals.

According to the Sunday New York Times this enterprise was started by Miss Bancroft in New York last winter, and at once became so popular that from two hundred and fifty subscribers to begin with, her customers soon increased to two thousand, although she only accepted five hundred, as she did not think it wise to cook the food in too large quantities.

Her plan is to prepare the meals in a central kitchen and deliver them in containers made on the principle of the thermos bottle, so that the temperature desired can be retained for about three hours after delivery.

Miss Bancroft says of her work: "In starting the kitchen our fundamental aim was to keep homes together during the great draft of women into industries for the war, and also to release women for Red Cross and other volunteer activities.

"The saving of waste is a large feature of the service, as each station puts one kitchen in the place of one hundred to two hundred private kitchens.

"All materials are used to the greatest advantage and in the smallest quantity.

"We corn our own beef, make our own soap and look out for other such economies.

"The service is designed to meet the need of the great mass of independent homes.

"It is not organized as a charity, but as a permanent effort at social betterment on a sound self-sustaining basis."

In such a community kitchen it will readily be seen that small households would receive the benefit of expert cooks, at the same time retaining the individuality and advantages of the family table.

Although organized as a branch of war work this enterprise is sure to outlast the war.

Our Boys Well Fed.

Our Saviour was ever ready to give strength to the body as a means of improving the soul.

In this same way perhaps our soldier boys will also find themselves benefited spiritually by the improvement in their physical condition.

Statistics show us that the average gain in weight of the American boy since entering the service has been twelve pounds, and this despite the fact that they have been undergoing most strenuous exercise.

They have not been allowed to eat the things in which they should not indulge, but have had food that has made them healthier, stronger and more muscular.

In an article on this subject, William H. Crawford gives us the two following menus, taken at random from the quartermaster's files.

They are sure to be of interest to every family from which a boy has gone to the colors:

THE CALL TO PRAYER.

Indications come from widely different sections of the country showing the new dependence upon God that is being born of the stress of the present times.

We are not apt to think of our Pacific slope as a section of the country much given to prayer, but this dispatch from Ontario California, shows that attention is now being directed to this means of help:

ONTARIO, CAL., June 17.—There's another way to help win the war and swat the Kaiser. Ontario is conducting a prayer drive for victory. The fire bell rings at noon each day, to remind all the people of the town to stop whatever work they may be doing, and with bowed heads to pray for victory and for the safe return of the boys they have sent overseas. This municipal angelus was instituted by proclamation of the mayor, at the request of the Town Council.

That this sentiment reaches from one end of the country to another is proved by the order issued last month, of the Governor of North Carolina, which is reported in these words:

RALEIGH, N. C., June 27.—Governor Bickett issued a proclamation today asking that all church bells be rung for two minutes at 7 o'clock each evening from June 30 until the end of the war, and that during the ringing of the bells all citizens "bow their heads in fervent prayer to the God of Battles to give our forces on sea and land wisdom, courage and fortitude and to make them more than conquerors of the powers of evil arrayed against them."

Continuing our Sunday morning use of Deuteronomy, we come next to the promises of National blessedness in the land, conditioned upon obedience to the revealed Will of God; the selection concluding with the thought that finds expression several times in the Old Testament, that true obedience is a middle path between two extremes: "thou shalt not go aside . . . to the right hand or to the left." There is a double use of the Old Testament for Christians: its teaching is fulfilled in the Christ and the Kingdom of God, here and hereafter; but there is another application which has been too much neglected in the past and is sadly needed in the present age—the duty and the blessedness of national as well as individual obedience to the laws of righteousness.

It is quite true and is by the pacifist overlooked that national duty is not always the same as duty for individual or Church. For instance, "judge not" can hardly have been intended for our courts; or "turn the other cheek" for policemen; yet obedience to God's Will is incumbent upon nations and the consequences of obedience or of disobedience are inevitable. It is even as the German philosopher affirmed, that "the history of the world is the judgment of the world." In the second lesson, St. James works out this same theme as applied to individuals in their mutual relations in both Church and State. Obedience is to the Royal law of love. It may be well to say that faith, which, according to St. Paul, is the means of union between ourselves and the Source of Goodness and Strength, must, according to St. James (and equally so according to St. Paul) show itself in good living. "If the Reformation cry was 'the just shall live by faith,' the needed slogan for today is 'the just shall live by faith.'"

Both these selections (Deuteronomy and St. James) would go admirably with the Collect for next Sunday; where the theme is loving obedience to God's Will; but obedience is not out of place in connection with the great subject of prayer brought before us in the Eucharistic services of today, as is more particularly brought out in the evening lesson, chosen for that purpose. In the Old Testament lesson, Zechariah gives the reasons for Judah's unanswered prayers: because the people had refused to execute justice and to show mercy and compassion and had oppressed the widow, the fatherless, the foreigner and the poor. It was for this reason that the temple had been destroyed in the past; and for the same reason that it was going to be destroyed again (A. D. 70) as prophesied by our Lord (Gospel for the day). In the second lesson our Lord deals with the two subjects together, prayer and the Will of God. In the model prayer our Lord teaches that the first two requisites of acceptable prayer are brotherly love ("our") and the doing of God's Will on earth as it is done in heaven; while in what follows, we are taught to seek first the Kingdom and righteousness of God—a righteousness Divine in its origin and social in its aim.

Let Thy merciful ears, O Lord, be open to the prayers of Thy humble servants; and, that they may obtain their petitions, make them to ask such things as shall please Thee; through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Collect for the Transfiguration of Christ.

O God, who on the mount didst reveal to chosen witnesses Thine only begotten Son wonderfully transfigured, in raiment white and glistening: Mercifully grant that we, being delivered from the disquietude of this world, may be permitted to behold the King in His beauty, who with Thee, O Father, and Thee, O Holy Ghost, liveth and reigneth, one God, world without end. Amen.

no longer through a symbolic Sacrifice; but through the True Paschal Lamb. The words Christ spoke on the Cross showed His Character as High Priest, King, Brother, Victim, Man, Victor, Son of God (Caley, pp. 125).

A Creative Belief.

One of the greatest things one person may do for another is to believe in him; yet how rarely do we realize this?

A man on a tramping trip through the mountains of West Virginia came one morning upon two children all alone on a desolate farm, away on the top of one of the highest mountains. The mother was dead, and "Pappy was away peddlin' fruit," the stranger was told.

"Why don't you stay with the neighbors while your father is away?" the traveler asked.

"Oh, we got to stay here, 'cause if we didn't somebody might come an' steal our chickens," the youngest child, a little girl, explained.

The stranger looked at her very small person. "Why," he laughed, "what could you do to a chicken thief?"

"I couldn't do nothin', but my brother could," she returned promptly. "Why, he's 'most nine years old!"

At her words the brother, a freckle-faced, insignificant youngster, was suddenly transformed. "Yes, sir!" he cried, with shining eyes. "Yes, sir! I could 'tend to 'em all right! I'm most nine years old!"

Now whether he could "tend to 'em" or not is beside the mark. The fact which struck home to the traveler was the change wrought in that small boy by his little sister's loyal belief in him. In telling the story afterwards, the man was always wont to declare that what he desired from his friends was a creative belief. "Criticism me," he would laugh, "and I am lost. But believe in me, believe in me as that little mountain child believed in her brother, and I can work miracles!"—Margaret Prescott Montague.

"And Shut Thy Door."

"But thou, when thou prayest, enter into thy closet and shut thy door."

"And shut thy door!" How well he knew

This human being he had made!
When day's long hours have harried you
At home or in the marts of trade,
How exquisite your spirit's thirst
To be aloof a little while
From that which frets and vexes worst—
The constant need to beck and smile.

You are alone within your room;
And yet your spirit craves still more
Assurance that no soul may loom
O'er your horizon—"shut thy door."
The sound of turning round the key
Within the lock—the balm it gives!
The current of your thoughts flows free,
Till soon again your best self lives.

This person and that other drew
Some vital part of you away—
They pulled and hauled and tortured you
Through all the busy, patient day.
This shut-in hour with none but God
(Who ne'er intrudes) will soon restore
Your feet to paths in calmness trod:
Enter your room "and shut thy door."

The Piping Piccolo.

Away back, near the last row, almost hidden in a corner behind other players at the final rehearsal for the grand concert, sat a little old man with a piccolo.

He loved the music. The violins thrilled him with their sweetness, the heavy-stringed instruments satisfied his sense of grandeur as the mighty crescendos rose in response to the conductor's baton.

His own little piccolo seemed meager, insignificant, out of place. Its small, shrill voice suddenly offended him, because it seemed to add neither sweetness nor grandeur to the wealth and beauty of the wonderful music. If he could only play a harp, or a first violin, he felt he could add the inspiration of his soul to the music, but the little piccolo—why, no one so much as knew he was there! Indulging thus in his discontent, he unconsciously stopped playing.

* * *

Suddenly, with an imperious wave of his baton, the conductor stopped the whole orchestra in the midst of one of its grandest burst of harmony. For an instant all was silent—an instant that seemed an age. Then—"Where is the piccolo?" the conductor demanded. "I cannot go on with this piece without the piccolo."

The little old man turned cold and then hot. His eyes swam in a mist. The rendition of the wonderful music was marred because his little, piping piccolo had stopped. Never would he falter again, for he had been shown that, not only the whole orchestra, but the great conductor himself were depending on him to play his part.

There is a wholesome lesson in this little incident. It is this. Sound your music! Keep it sounding at all times, and let the notes be clear, and pure, and sweet. Then the echoes, sweeping out into the world will bring back answering chords of joy, faith, love.

Put yourself unreservedly under the guidance and control of the Master Musician, so that, led and trained by his skillful hands, your whole nature will begin at once to make the sweetest music ever heard—the music of a loving heart.—Peter Ryder.

The Girl Who Never Had Small Change.

The year after we were graduated from college we went back to commencement—all the ten of us who had lived in Wood Cottage, except one. That one was Sally Jameson. There were unforeseen difficulties, she had written, in the way of her returning at just that time. We did not miss her as much as we might had she been Polly Lewis or Bertha Sampson or Elizabeth Sumner. Still, we had hoped the ten might be complete, and Sally had always been lots of fun.

"I've been wondering," ventured Polly, as we sat under the maple outside the cottage windows where we had sat so many times before, "I've been wondering what Sally's unforeseen difficulties could be. Perhaps, and a wicked twinkle came into Polly's blue eyes, "perhaps one was that she hadn't any small change."

"Now, Polly!" we all remonstrated. "Well," persisted Polly, not at all abashed, "you all know Sally never did have any small change, so why should we expect any now? What a girl does in college is a pretty good indication of what she will do after she gets out. Sally left last June owing me $2.65 for car-fares. You see, she never had any small change when we got on the car. But I was hoping she'd bring enough back with her this time to straighten matters out. It isn't that I care about the money, but I like Sally so much that I hate to have that $2.65 between us."

Polly's daring had loosened our tongues.

"It was that way about stamps," confessed Bertha Sampson, who had been Sally's roommate. "Sally always borrowed them of me and she never had small change enough to pay me for them. I didn't keep account at first, but I did the last semester and she owed me seventy-eight cents when she left in June."

"And yet Sally was such a dear," I said, feeling that Sally wasn't being treated fairly when she wasn't there to defend herself. "She used to be such fun and so thoughtful if any one were ill, and so gracious to strangers. I don't believe she had a fault except that one of borrowing."

"But that's just why we don't miss her more now," some one explained. "It's a fault like that that spoils a girl who is otherwise fine all the way through. Probably Sally was just careless and forgot about the car-fares and the stamps and the ice cream sodas, but still we can't help wondering whether she really did forget or not."

"Well, she taught me a lesson, anyhow," concluded Polly, "and I'm grateful for that. She taught me to be just as careful to pay back five cents as fifty dollars. Besides, since I've known Sally I always take care to have small change about me. I can't afford to lose any of my friends because I've imposed on them too often."

And, although we all shook our heads at the irrepressible Polly, we every one agreed with her!—The Well-spring.

Deedles.

A correspondent writes us: "In reading an interesting story in the Southern Churchman of July 13, entitled, 'The Homing Instincts of a Cat,' I am forcibly reminded of an incident that occurred here, as follows:

If there can be such a figure in the feline family as a born aristocrat, poor Deedles was richly entitled to this distinction. When three years old, he was the acknowledged king among his feline followers—and was, no doubt, the victor of many vicious brawls that disturbed the back alleys and byways of the neighborhood in which he roamed.

In the course of events the family who held the ownership title to this roaming warrior, moved to another section of the city, and Deedles was thrown among new associates, where bad traits in his character developed. He was accused of surreptitiously entering the kitchens and storerooms of the neighbors.

A steel trap was baited with a tempting piece of meat, and poor Deedles came limping home one morning minus two inches of his right fore-paw. However, he soon recovered, but the loss of one of his fighting appendages removed him from the class of victorious cats, and this mortified his vanity to such an extent that he became morose. He would absent himself for months in some remote cellar and subsist on such foods as he could capture.

Each time, after several months' absence, Deedles would be forgotten. Then unexpectedly he would turn up, but all his former aristocratic bearing had vanished, and he appeared as an escaped convict.

Months passed into years, the family who reared Deedles as a pet had again moved, and yet the old prodigal, now nearing twelve years, would occasionally come limping to the new abode, after nearly a year of absence.

One evening he came back to his home limping—trembling and mewing, as if soliciting pity, then laid in full length by the warm fire and passed away. A mute and pathetic exhibition of home attachment.

PHILIP F. BROWN.

For the Southern Churchman.

"If—"

There is a certain monosyllable that has the power of being as annoying as a mosquito, and as hurtful—"If." A perfectly legitimate little word, but it possesses unlimited pestiferous possibilities. Also, it has the unpardonable habit of attacking its victim from behind. "If I just hadn't done this," a warrior grieves, or "If I just hadn't done that," so and so would not have happened. "If only I had made this move," or "If only I had refrained from making that"—the ifs are innumerable and indefatigable, they swarm and sting. In mass formation they resemble hornets more than mosquitoes; there is no combating them.

Everybody knows that a certain amount of sober retrospect is an excellent thing. If we didn't sometimes take stock of yesterday and cast up last month's accounts, we should indeed be in a bad way. But it is easy to overdo the thing. "If only I had stayed at home," one householder wails, "this catastrophe might have been avoided!" Another mourns that her whole week's plans would not have failed if only she had gone to town and learned an important fact instead of staying at home and attending to what she honestly believed to be her business for that particular day. Then after awhile each repiner begins to reflect that after all if she had done the undone thing, or vice versa, some other dire result might have come about, and they grow confused and at last cannot tell at all what might have transpired "If—." The pesky monosyllable bears a sting in both head and tail.

On greater things, also, "If" preys. When a big blow falls or an overwhelming sorrow comes many of us are prone to give ourselves over to anxious remembering. We pick our grief to pieces and wonder and speculate as to whether or not it was inevitable. "If I had done differently," the heart cries to itself, "this might have been averted!" "If I had said no here, or yes there, all might have been different now." We peer back down the road and fancy that we see a dozen places where our feet misstepped. "If Thou hadst been here," cried Martha of Bethany to Christ, "our brother had not died."

It is true, of course, that frequently our afflictions are the direct outcome of our sins and blunders; but it is equally true that often we needlessly harass our souls. It ought to be easy enough to recognize the disaster that is the logical result of our misdoing; yet it seems fatally easy, by probing and searching, to make ourselves think we have discovered some thread of circumstance on which the whole sad circumstance hangs—when probably there is no connection whatever between the two.

One great white fact should always be our comfort—that when we have done our best there can be no possible occasion for remorse. The wonderful truth is that much of the weaving of the web of life is intrusted to our own hands, but that at the same time there are certain threads in the pattern with which we have nothing to do. These threads, a marvellous, intricate, inevitable part of the whole, the great Master Weaver, who stands with us before the loom leads in and out with His own hands. Though the final pattern may be largely determined by our own efforts, there will be golden threads picking out a design that we should not have had the will or the skill to devise—a design quite indispensable to the beauty of the whole.

Christ purposely tarried on the road to Bethany in order that by the raising of the dead man He might show forth the whole glory of God. "If Thou hadst been here" Lazarus would not have died—truly; but neither would the wondering throng have beheld life defying death, God incarnate weeping above an humble grave. All of Martha's anguish was a small price to pay for the sight of those human tears of her Lord's for the friend He loved. So her "if" was futile, like so many of our own.

The wise way is to admit our fault, if fault there be, and set about avoiding it in future days. When we have only done our best, and the visitation of sorrow comes from without, as it were, we have no business bowing our heads to the swarm of "ifs" that are always ready to attack. "If" is the sign of the subjunctive mode—the mode of doubt, as our grammar long ago told us—and generally speaking it is too negative and feeble a word to be allowed to work great mischief. To walk forever in a cloud of prickly "ifs" is to find life scarcely worth the living!

"Since" is a better word, as that same Martha knew—"But since Thou art now come, all will be well"—the adverb that accepts the bitter inevitable and sees in it hope and reconstruction instead of despair.

Suggested by a sermon from the text, "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament; and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

Your service star, that speaks of him,
Hangs on the windowpane;
You see it, and your eyes grow dim—
"O will he come again?"

Long ago in a little town
A mother wept and smiled—
As mothers may with heart bowed down—
To greet her new-born child.

For Mary knew, ah, doubt it not,
The path His feet should tread,
But looked beyond that lonely spot
Where bowed His dying head,

She saw, by light of a star above,
His future service high
To truth and honor, faith and love—
The things that cannot die.

O mother, in your lonely home,
Look up, and see afar
Where angels hang in Heaven's high dome
The first great Service Star!

Sweeten Summer Drinks With Syrup.

A large quantity of sugar may be saved this summer by making a syrup of the sugar to be used in sweetening ice tea, lemonade and all other cool beverages, instead of using dry sugar, is a timely suggestion from the July Woman's Home Companion. Add about one-third as much water as sugar, bring to a boil and cool. Add the liquid to the beverage; the amount will be governed by individual taste, but be careful not to use more than is necessary. In this way the drink is sweetened uniformly, as all the sugar is melted; then, too, there is no wasted sugar left in the bottom of the glasses.

When we consider that most families usually have cold drinks twice a day, and that in every glass there is more or less sugar left, we can easily realize what a saving would result from the use of this conservation syrup.

FAVORITE HYMNS.

IX. Art Thou Weary, Art Thou Languid?

The fact that this hymn is merely a paraphrased translation from the ancient original does not detract in the least from its beauty and worth. Indeed, the great age of the poem—twelve hundred years—and its strange history and setting seem to invest it with a kind of special appeal.

The poem was composed by a monk of the eighth century named Steven, in an environment so wild and weird, so far removed from the present day, that the hymn comes to us as a kind of sweet, far cry from the very childhood of Christianity. Steven was one of a band of monks that lived in the old, old monastery of Mars Saba, founded before the flight of Mohammed. The monastery still stands on its original site, the great rock that looks down upon the valley of Kedron, and to this day, a writer tells us, far below in the depths of the gorge, wolves muster at dawn to eat the waste thrown down from the monastery.

The poet-monk seems to have been gifted from on high with the power of charging a few simple words with the very essence of the Spirit of Christ. "This song of Steven the Sabite," the same author continues, "originally raised on the stormy outposts of eastern Christendom that were already threatened with submersion beneath the stern tide of Moslem conquest, rings . . . through the whole wide world to-day."

Art thou weary, art thou languid,
Art thou sore distressed?
"Come to me," saith One, "and coming,
Be at rest."

Hath He marks to lead me to Him,
If He be my guide?
"In His feet and hands are wound-prints,
And His side."

Is there diadem, as monarch,
That His brow adorns?
"Yea, a crown, in very surety,
But of thorns."

If I find Him, if I follow,
What His guerdon here?
"Many a sorrow, many a labor,
Many a tear."

If I still hold closely to Him
What hath He at last?
"Sorrow vanquished, labor ended, Jordan past."

If I ask Him to receive me,
Will He say me nay?
"Not till earth, and not till heaven Pass away."

Finding, following, keeping, struggling,
Is He sure to bless?
Saints, apostles, prophets, martyrs
Answer, "Yes."

Appeal for Continuous Day and Night Prayer.

By the Mothers of Defenders of Democracy.

Purposes: To envelope the whole nation in continuous prayer, making President Wilson's proclamation for May 30th the basis of continuous appeal for National Guidance, Protection of Our Sons and Victory of International Justice and Righteousness.

Plan: Successive one minute silent individual prayers every minute of the day and night, hundreds and thousands praying—one group successively following another, so that there shall be no break in the continuous appeal.

Your Part: Write at once to Mothers of Defenders of Democracy, 51 East Forty-second Street, New York City, pledging yourself to give at least one minute each day—every day for a year—to prayer for such Guidance, Protection and Victory.

Method of Operation: Upon receipt of your pledge, the Mothers of Defenders of Democracy will send you a card designating the minute you are to consecrate to prayer. There are 144 half-hour periods arranged for each day, each beginning ten minutes in advance of the one preceding. For example, one extends from 10 A. M. to 10:30 A. M.; the next from 10:10 A. M. to 10:40 A. M., thus periods overlap three times. The time assigned will be any minute within a certain half-hour. Thus with thousands praying no one minute will be without prayer, even should one petitioner be a few minutes early or a few minutes late.

The Shearing.

The day we cut the baby's hair
The house was all a-fidget;
Such fuss we made you would have said
He was a king, the midget.

Some wanted this, some wanted that,
Some thought that it was dreadful
To lay a hand upon one strand
Of all that precious headful;

While others thought to leave his curls
Would be the height of folly—
Unless they put him with the girls,
And called him Sue or Molly.

The barber's shears went snip-a-snip,
The golden fluff was flying;
Grandmother had a trembling lip,
And aunt was almost crying.

The men-folks said, "Why, hello, Boss,
You're looking five years older!"
But mother laid the shaven head
Close, close against her shoulder.

Ah, well, the nest must lose its birds,
The cradle yield its treasure,
Time will not stay a single day
For any pleader's pleasure.

But when that hour's work was weighed
The scales were even, maybe,
For father gained a little man
When mother lost her baby.

Candles and Cakes.

Lee and Rosa always celebrated their birthdays together. Lee's came on the seventh of August and his sister's on the ninth, so every year they "split the difference," as their father said, and had a party on the eighth. Rosa's flowered china tea-set was always used and the table was decorated with wild flowers gathered by Lee. Then there were gifts around each plate, and ice-cream and candy. But the best thing about the party was two large cakes: a jelly cake for Lee, trimmed with red candles, "to match his hair," Rosa said, and a golden sponge cake for Rosa, who had fair hair and blue eyes. Her cake was covered with smooth white icing and ornamented with blue candles. On the inside of each cake a small gift was to be found—usually the prize gift of the collection.

Naturally, the eighth of August was a great date in the calendar. But this year, alas, when Lee was to be eight and Rosa six, everything had seemed to go wrong. First, there were no small candles to be bought at the village store, and the city was too far away for ordering them in time. Then, mother and Aunt Reba had reluctantly decided that since sugar was so scarce only one cake should be baked.

"Leave out the candy instead!" the children cried.

But, no, the candy was to be left out anyway. The only question was, what kind of cake should it be? Aunt Reba generously offered to see if she could not think up a cake that should be part jelly and part sponge, but this idea did not please.

"It would be like patchwork then," said Rosa, fretfully.

Lee tried not to sulk, but his forehead puckered. "If we can't have the candles I don't care anyway," he said. "But what a birthday!"

They stole out into the yard sorrowfully, leaving Aunt Reba and mother looking very sad. "Take a little walk down the woods road," Aunt Reba called. "Maybe you will have some fun and forget the poor cakes."

So away they went, hand in hand, not noticing the wild flowers they had planned to gather. At a turn in the road they came upon a small house that they knew quite well. It had been vacant for a long while, but to-day the windows were wide, and a little girl stood behind the sagging gate. She had dark curls and a rosy face, and she looked at the children and smiled.

"What is your name?" Rosa asked. She suddenly forgot all about cakes and candles.

"Rosalie," said the strange little girl, still smiling. "We've just moved here. Come in."

"We might be in the way," Lee answered. "You come out and play with us in the woods."

An hour later Aunt Reba looked out and saw her niece and nephew running up the walk. She met them at the door. "Good news!" she called cheerily. "I find that Mr. Greene is going to town in his car and will buy the candles. What color shall they be?" Aunt Reba had rather dreaded to put the question; perhaps neither child would be willing to give way to the other. "Red candles or blue?" she asked.

"Pink!" cried Lee and Rosa together. "Pink?" Aunt Reba echoed in surprise.

"And chocolate for icing," Rosa added, importantly.

By this time they had reached her side. "O auntie," Lee cried, almost out of breath, "down the road there's a little girl order than Rosa who's had a birthday only one year in her life."

Rosa nodded her head hard. "One single birthday in seven years," she said.

"It is this way," Lee went on. "Her mother's explained it. Rosalie—that's her name—was born on the twenty-ninth of February, and because of leap years only one February twenty-ninth has come since then. She had a birthday when she was four, and that's all."

"And when she was four," Rosa put in, her eyes large with eagerness, "she didn't have any cake or candles, or anything. I asked her why, and she said just because she couldn't."

Aunt Reba looked interested and somewhat sad. "Many little girls have nothing but a birthday," she said.

"But this one will!" cried Lee. "What do you think we're going to do? Give her our eighth of August. Do you know, her age comes right in between ours—isn't that queer?"

Aunt Reba smiled. "And isn't it queer, too," that her name is your two names put together? Rosalie—Rosa and Lee.

The children had not thought of that, and were much pleased. "I knew there was a little strange girl down the road," Aunt Reba continued, "but I didn't know things would turn out as nicely as this. Now call mother, and we four will make our plans."

They planned so well that on the eighth of August three beaming children sat down to a lovely birthday table. Candy was lacking, and Lee and Rosa did not have as many presents as usual, but somehow they seemed quite content. Before one place sat a large brown cake covered thickly with chocolate and blazing with rose-colored candles. "Dark brown for Rosalie's hair and eyes," the children laughed, "and pink for her cheeks."

As for the guest of honor, she could hardly believe her wide eyes. When the cake was cut there were seven presents for her in its yellow heart, one for the present birthday and one for each birthday she had missed—"for she missed them all, you know," Rosa had explained to Aunt Reba, sadiy. There was the slender little silver bracelet that was to have been Rosa's, and the small pocket magnifying glass that was intended for Lee; the children insisted that these should go into the cake. Then, Aunt Reba had dressed a wee china doll in dainty silk, and mother had found a little blue celluloid thimble to put in as her share. Father contributed a shining new silver quarter, and the whole family gave together a bright scarlet and white button that made little Rosalie a real member of the Red Cross, and that pleased her almost more than anything else.

When the cake and ice-cream had vanished, and all the gifts had been duly admired, Rosalie came up to Aunt Reba and put out her hand gravely. "I've heard about birthdays all my life," she said in her quaint little way, "but I didn't know they could be like this."

"Neither did we!" cried Lee and Rosa in joyful duet. "This is the best we ever had."

The Lost Ball.

Grandpa and Grandma Barlow had been away from the farmhouse only two hours. But much can happen in even that length of time. When they returned, it was to find that Carl and William had quarreled.

The two little boys were cousins. One lived in Chicago and the other in Pittsburgh. They were spending the summer on the farm. And that was the first quarrel.

"It was my ball, my very best one!" Carl declared. "And William lost it. He said he just threw it against the side of the house. And it hain't—I mean isn't—there. He—he—"

"I didn't steal his old ball!" William shouted, his round face very red. "I didn't, grandpa! I just threw the ball and—I—I can't find it."

"Oh, bother, now!" and grandpa rose. "Men don't quarrel, not over little things like that. Of course we shall find the ball."

"And little cousins who love each other like brothers? I hope my boys are not angry," grandma said gently. But they were. They both trudged off, to help hunt for the ball, but grandpa noticed that they walked a long way apart.

The ball was lost. At the end of a half hour even grandpa had to admit that.

At first it had looked very easy. William said he had thrown it against the east side of the house. There the lawn was smoothly mowed, and there were no flower-beds or clumps of shrubbery. The little boy could not throw with force enough to send the ball far; it must be at hand.

Grandpa and the boys looked everywhere. Not until it seemed as if they had inspected every blade of grass on that side of the house did Grandpa discover that the cellar window was open a little way.

"Here 'tis! We shall find your ball down in the cellar, lads."

He led the way in through the house, closely followed by both boys. They searched the cellar, looking in every place where a ball, coming through the window, could have rolled. But it was in vain. The ball was not to be found.

William broke down and cried. He would go home. He was not a thief. He had lots of balls in Pittsburgh, better than any old Chicago balls.

And all the time Carl sulked. If William had not stolen the ball, where was it?

Not even grandma could dispel the cloud that had settled over the old farmhouse. Both boys went to bed early, and, although neither of them would have admitted it, each cried himself to sleep.

The next morning it was even worse. An open and noisy quarrel was only averted by grandma's firmness. Breakfast over, she suggested that Carl go to the mill with grandpa, while William helped her pick berries.

"No, I do not want you to be together, not while you feel as you do now," she said.

Just before grandpa was ready to start a great outcry was heard. It came from the screened-in back porch. Only grandma knew that Betty, the hired girl, was preparing to churn there. The outcry was so loud that they all ran to the porch. Betty cried: "The cream is spoiled, Mrs. Barlow! I brought the can up from the cellar, and when I poured it in the churn the bottom was all black and dirty. This was in it," and she held up the missing ball.

At first the mystery was not cleared, only changed. But grandpa soon showed the boys how the ball came to be in the cream can.

The can had stood directly under the window, which was open. In passing through the window the ball had dropped on the loose cover of the can. This had tipped enough to allow the ball to fall into the can. Then the cover had risen to its place.

"I'm sorry the cream is spoiled," Carl said, "but maybe the little pigs will like it. And, William, I am sorry I said—"

William laughed. "Oh, don't let's be sorry, Carl! Let's be glad! Say, if grandpa will let us both go to the mill with him, we'll pick all the berries when we come back."

"Course we will. We like to do things together."—Hope Daring.

Dwight Dawson wrote and wrote. He began the work soon after supper, and at nine o'clock he put the stopper into the ink bottle with a little sigh.

His Uncle Harvey Dawson heard the sigh and looked up from the paper he was reading. He noticed the ink-stained fingers and the open writing book. "Do you have a hard lesson for to-morrow?" he asked.

"I wasn't studying my lesson; I was practicing my writing. The county superintendent will visit our school some day next week, and I was getting a page of my copy book ready to show him. I have put three times as much work on it as on any other page. Doesn't it look nice?" Dwight held the book up for his uncle's inspection. "I think it is a fine sample page."

Mr. Dawson made no remarks on the work. "Let me see the book," he requested. He turned all the pages slowly and examined each one. "What is a sample page, Dwight?"

"Why, why," the boy hesitated. "It is one that a person gets ready for an exhibition, I guess. That's what mine is for, anyway—to exhibit to the superintendent," as Miss Lane said, he ended with a little laugh.

"There is the dictionary. Will you kindly look up the word 'sample' and read the definition?"

Dwight turned the leaves until he found the word he wished. "'Sample, a small part of a large quantity shown as a representative of the quality of the whole,'" he read.

"In other words, a sample is supposed to be a fair likeness of its kind," Mr. Dawson turned to the sample page. "Now, Dwight, that page is unlike all the other pages in this book. It does not look like your usual writing at all. You took a great deal of care with this page, and you have not with the others. It isn't fair to exhibit that as a sample of your writing; that is a show page, not a sample page."

"Why, Uncle Harvey," Dwight gasped in surprise. "I thought you should always do a thing well to show the county superintendent of schools."

"You should, but you want your regular work, day by day, done well, too. You can write very well when you try; but these other pages show that you do not try every day, but just for a special occasion. What if the superintendent should look at the other pages in the copy book?"

Dwight looked serious. "I—I had not thought of that," he confessed.

"If he should look at them, he would know that this page is not a sample page and that you do your regular work in a careless way." Mr. Dawson laid down the copy-book and took up his paper again.

The next morning, when Dwight came down to breakfast, he laid some money by his plate and looked a little shyly at his uncle. "I intend to buy a new writing book to-day. Miss Lane keeps them to sell, so we will all have the same kind, and I am going to have the first page for a sample page. I will do every page as well as I can and not just the one I will show to the county superintendent. He may see everything I have in the new book when he comes."

"I like that plan. I know that your sample pages will really represent your writing this time," replied his uncle encouragingly.

"I am always going to remember that my sample work must be a good likeness of all my work," Dwight replied earnestly. "I am glad you made me understand what a sample really is, Uncle Harvey."—Sarah N. McCreery, in Herald and Presbyter.

Nuxated Iron The Power Behind Strong, Keen, Red-Blooded Americans

"To help make strong, keen, red-blooded Americans there is nothing in my experience which I have found so valuable as organic iron—Nuxated Iron," says Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and the Westchester County Hospital. Nuxated Iron often increases the strength and endurance of weak, nervous, run-down people in two weeks' time. It is now being used by over three million people annually, including such men as Hon. Leslie M. Shaw, former Secretary of the Treasury, and ex-Governor of Iowa; former United States Senator Richard Rolland Kenney of Delaware, at present Major of the U. S. Army; General John L. Clem (Retired), the drummer boy of Shiloh, who was sergeant in the U. S. Army when only 12 years of age; also United States Judge G. W. Atkinson of the Court of Claims of Washington and others. Nuxated Iron is dispensed by all good druggists everywhere.

Interment at Shrensbury Church, Kent County, Md., Sunday, July 21st.

MRS. MARY CORNELIA BRISCOE RANSON.

At 6:30 P. M. on July 12, 1918, at the "Homestead," near Charles Town, W. Va., MRS. CORNELIA RANSON passed peacefully into the life beyond.

She was a sister of Bishop Brown, of Virginia, the eldest daughter of Robert L. and Margaret Cabell Brown, and granddaughter of the late Mayo Cabell, of Union Hill, Nelson County, Va. She married in 1880 Dr. James M. Ranson, and came to live at the old Ranson home, "The Homestead." There all of her married life was spent, and there the natural sweetness of the manner and the purity of her character soon gained for her many friends, and bound them to her always. Very early in life she was confirmed in the "faith of her fathers," and became a member of the Episcopal Church. Her life was so full of service, and her faith so true, there was no time or room for doubts. Her going out of this life was with the confidence of one falling asleep. As eldest sister in charge of her father's home, as wife, mother and friend, she was true, loving and faithful. Her reward therefore must be sure. She was laid to rest in Zion Church yard, Charles Town, W. Va., services being conducted by her pastor, Rev. John S. Alfriend.

The cares, the duties and the anxious moments passed, The things that make life's burdens, but its love still lasts; The shadows lengthen, and the day is nearly done, Life's tasks are finished, and its crown is won.

God and Man Are Partners.

We are laborers together with God. God and man are partners in this business; they work together and help each other. Neither can do complete work without the other; let them join hands and labor together, and the largest and most blessed results will be attained. There is something inspiring in this thought. It crowns life with dignity, lifts us out of the dust, and puts us in the same class with God. We are partners in the same business with Him and share in the profits. We see this truth illustrated most simply and forcibly in the material world. The farmer is plainly a fellow-worker with God. God creates the soil, and the farmer plows it. God furnishes the seed, and the farmer sows it. God shines and rains upon the corn, and the farmer cultivates it. God ripens the wheat, and the farmer reaps it. They thus work together as plainly and truly as two men that are lifting the same load. The wheat in the barn is the product of their joint labor. If either of these two partners were to withhold his labor, there would be no harvest. Seed without sowing or plowing without seed would not yield a grain or a blade. Without God the farmer can do nothing, and without the farmer God will do nothing. Let them combine and become laborers together, and the fields will wave with wheat and the valleys rustle with corn. Not only the farmer, but every worker in material things is thus a fellow-worker with God.—Banner.

PREPAREDNESS FOR THE CHURCH

Never in the history of the country has the Church's responsibility in upholding the ideals of the nation been so great.

In rendering its share of the essential work, its buildings should provide for maximum efficiency in every department.

Consult the leading specialists in all branches of church improvement, construction, alteration, etc.

Designs will be prepared indicating how contemplated changes, etc., can be effected. Local labor will be availed of when desired for the constructive work, the artistic and elaborate enrichment being executed under the supervision of our New York artists.

Send for photographs of church interiors showing changes and improvements that have been accomplished, with memorial gifts included as a part of the scheme.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

What we emphasize forms the character.

A church cannot be spiritually minded and ignore missions.

A gloomy Christian is not contemplated in the New Testament.

Blessed is any weight, however overwhelming, which God has been so good as to fasten with His own hand upon our shoulders!

Control, give, sympathize! these three must be learned and practised: self-control, charity and sympathy.—Oriental Saying.

Life, indeed, must always be a compromise between common sense and the ideal—the one abating nothing of its demands, the other accommodating itself to what is practicable and real.

Sanctified afflictions are an evidence of our adoption; we do not prune dead trees to make them fruitful nor those which are planted in a desert; but such as belong to the garden and possess life.

When I go out of doors in the summer night, and see how high the stars are, I am persuaded there is time enough here or somewhere for all that I must do; and the good world manifests very little impatience.—Emerson.

Do not run after happiness, but seek to do good, and you will find that happiness will run after you. The day will dawn, full of expectation—the night will fall, full of repose. This world will seem a very good place, and the world to come a better place still.

Just to be pitiful and kind

Is all I ask;

To help some one who does not love his task

Of living, or some other who is blind

To joy, or very weary or afraid.

Renew Your Health At Nature's Fountain

Without the Expense and Loss of Time Necessary
for a Visit to the Spring

THE CRISIS

There comes a time in the life of practically every man and woman when their digestive or eliminative organs, or both, fail to respond to drugs prepared by human skill. In fact drugs seem to do them about as much harm as good for their systems rebel against all drugs. These are the cases which physicians call "stubborn" and "chronic" for the reason that they persist in spite of drug treatment. I do not refer to incurable diseases such as cancer and consumption, but to that larger class of functional disorders which we meet every day, where the organs of digestion and elimination are impaired.

For this class of cases our best physicians and our big city specialists send their wealthy patients to the mineral springs where, in the great majority of cases they are permanently restored or decidedly benefited. But what about the poor man who has not the money or the busy man or woman who cannot spare the time to spend several weeks or possibly months at a health resort? Shall circumstances deny them the restoration to health which Nature has provided? Read my answer in the coupon at the bottom of this page.

I have the utmost confidence in the Shivar Mineral Spring Water for to it I owe my Restoration to Health and probably my Life. It has made me tens of thousands of friends in all parts of America and even in foreign countries, whose faces I have never seen. Yet I count them my friends for the Shivar Spring Water has bound them to me by lasting gratitude.

I ask you to read their letters, a few samples of which I publish below for your benefit, and if you find among them any encouragement as to your own health do not hesitate to accept my offer which has no limits or conditions except those shown on the coupon. If you could read the letters that come to me daily, numbering about ten thousand a year, and the vast majority of them similar to those printed below, you would not wonder that I make this offer displaying my absolute confidence in the restorative powers of Shivar Mineral Water.

INDIGESTION

Savannah, Georgia.
I was suffering with indigestion, stomach and liver disorders and all its train of horrifying phenomena for several months. I had lived on milk, soft eggs, shredded wheat, a very insufficient diet for an active working man, and, of course, from disease and starvation was in a very low state of nervous vitality and general debility. I ordered ten gallons of your Mineral Water which I used continuously reordering when necessary, and in four months gained twenty-nine pounds, was strong and perfectly well, and have worked practically every day since. It acts as a general renovator of the system. I prescribe it in my practice, and it has in every instance had the desired effects. It is essential to use this water in as large quantities as possible, for its properties are so happily blended and in such proportion that they will not disturb the most delicate system. It is purely Nature's remedy.

La Grange, Ga., Nov. 25, 1914.
I feel it my duty to suffering humanity to make public announcement of the benefits I have derived from Shivar Spring Water. I have been a sufferer for the past twenty-five years from indigestion and dyspepsia. After one week's trial of Shivar Water I commenced to improve, and after drinking it for four weeks I gained fifteen pounds. I feel better and stronger than I have in twenty-five years. I strongly recommend this Water to any one with stomach trouble of any character, and truly believe it will cure ulcer of the stomach. I am writing this voluntarily and trust it will fall in the hands of many who are so unfortunate as to be afflicted with indigestion and nervous dyspepsia.

C. V. TRUITT,
President Unity Cotton Mills.

DYSPEPSIA

Baltimore, Md., April 30, 1914.
For many years I suffered with stomach trouble as a direct result of asthma. I consulted the very best specialist in this country, and spent quite a large sum of money in my endeavor to get relief. However, I had about come to the conclusion that my case was hopeless, but by accident I happened to get hold of one of your booklets, and decided to try Shivar Spring Water. After drinking the water for about three weeks I was entirely relieved, and since that time have suffered but little inconvenience from my trouble. I cheerfully recommend the use of your Water to any one that may be suffering from stomach trouble.

It is a great pleasure to tell you that your Water has been a great benefit. I may say a great blessing, to me. My wife says it has helped me more than anything else I ever tried. I have been, for thirty years, a sufferer from stomach trouble.

REV. E. H. ROWE,

Co-President Southern Seminary.

RHEUMATISM

Leeds, S. C.

I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of rheumatism, chronic indigestion, kidney and bladder troubles, and in nervous and sick headaches, and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the liver, kidneys and bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter.

C. A. CROSBY, M. D.
Florence, S. C.

I suffered with indigestion and kidney trouble, and a year ago was stricken with acute articular rheumatism; was helpless for months, and since using your Spring Water I am walking without any crutch and improving daily. Indigestion much relieved. I wish I could write Shivar Spring Water in the sky so that the world could become acquainted with it.

MRS. THEO. KUKER.

BILIOUSNESS

Greenville, S. C., Feb. 26, 1914.

For over two years, following a nervous breakdown, I have suffered with a liver so torpid that ordinary remedies were absolutely powerless. Under such circumstances, I came to Shivar Spring, and began drinking the Water. Upon advice, however, the first night I took a laxative; the second night a milder one. Since then I have taken none at all. The effect of the water has been remarkable — its action on my liver most marked, and my health and spirits greatly improved. I am satisfied that the laxative, followed by the Water, was the proper treatment in my case. My condition is now perfect.

S. A. DERIEUX.

RENAL AND CYSTIC

Columbia, S. C.

I suffered for eight years with kidney trouble and inflammation of the bladder to the extent that I would have to get up during the night some five or six times. After using this water only a few days, I am entirely relieved and suffer no more effect of the trouble whatever.

J. P. D.

High Point, N. C., Oct. 6, 1914

My wife has had a bad kidney trouble for several years. She has been using the water only about three weeks and it has already made her a new woman. Her color is much improved her appetite is all that she could wish for, her digestion seems to be perfect. We give Shivar Springs credit for it all.

THE CORRESPONDENCE OF DRS. SMITH AND WALKER WITH OUR BISHOPS.

With the letter of Bishop Gallor, published in our issue of week before last, this correspondence has for the present come to a close. The honors seem to lie with our Congregational brethren. They had the advantage of a clear purpose immediately in view and a definite, albeit, under the circumstances, an impracticable, proposition to present. They appealed with considerable force to an overture in behalf of Christian unity made by the Bishops themselves and expressed a willingness to meet them on this platform and, if possible, to devise a plan for meeting an emergency as well as furthering the general object in view by some action which might well lead to larger things. Their letters have been marked with singular dignity, sincerity and courtesy, and are a distinct contribution to the cause of Church unity. They found the Bishops unprepared to take advantage of this opportunity. Taken somewhat unawares, with no opportunity for consultation or even for framing such a reply as it was in the heart of many of them to make, they could only confess their inability to act; and their reply was, unfortunately, so framed as to indicate an unwillingness to do so or even to consider the matter at this time. The frank regrets expressed by many of the Bishops since that this answer should have been made in such haste and have been so inadequate has purged them from intentional discourtesy or lack of sympathy with the underlying purpose of their memorialists, and they have been the first to confess their dissatisfaction, which is shared by a large portion of the Church, at the futile outcome.

It is quite true that nothing could immediately have come of the proposition that our Bishops confer episcopal ordination upon ministers of other churches who, from the nature of the case, would be unable to comply with the requirements of our canons or of the ordination service itself. The value of the appeal made by the Congregationalists would have been found to lie in the opportunity for conference and the possibility of finding some available ground for constructive action at a time when circumstances were most favorable for such a course. That the Bishops were unprepared for this seems to show that something is lacking on the part of our Church to enable it to bring its good desires for unity to good effect. We have walked around a big problem and viewed it from every side and expressed our sentiments about it very sincerely, but we have never attacked it. The utmost that we have done is to invite our separated brethren to think about it too, and some time or other to have a talk with us on the subject. But not a provision has been made, a power conferred or a canon muzzled as a practical measure for bringing about results. Our treatment of the subject has been merely academic. Perhaps we, like our Congregational friends, have been over-impressed with the supposed powers and authority of that "assemblage of Catholic Bishops, considering and acting upon matters of duty and responsibility resting on them as a portion of the universal Episcopate," known as the Council of Bishops or the Bishops in Council, forgetting that this is simply the Bishops in private conference with no power save to advise each other. The Chicago quadrilateral was simply the adoption by the House of Bishops of conclusions arrived at in such a conference. This was communicated to the House of Deputies for its information only, and later a Commission on Christian Unity was appointed with power to communicate this declaration to other organized Christian bodies in this country at their discretion and to be ready to "confer" with them if desired. Beyond that and a similar proposition to confer we have never gone; and when after thirty-two years of desultory conference the seed sown bears fruit in a proposition to do something, we find ourselves totally unprepared and incompetent even to give an answer, much less to meet an offer.

But oftentimes well-meant efforts in a good cause have results other than those immediately intended, and we hope it may be so with the proposal of our good friends which seem to have been so fruitless. To those who have the will to unity it has been a welcome episode and full of promise. It has created a revival of interest in the subject from a practical viewpoint and raised questions which can hardly be ignored by this Church. She has had too little faith in her own professions and the merits of her convictions as well as in the responsive attitude of her neighbors. Events have moved more rapidly than she anticipated and on a different line. Her deliberate processes are likely to prove too slow for the day of opportunity. Since her proposed basis of unity has been taken seriously by some of her separated fellow-Christians and her co-operation and leadership has been definitely sought, she must mend her hold upon this great problem and give practical proof of her sincerity and capacity in the role she has essayed to fill. In these days, when the unification of the forces of God's Kingdom is everywhere being indicated, it behooves the Church of the Reconciliation, as we fondly describe ourselves, to make good her professions and to adapt herself to the movements of Divine Providence. If the unity of the Church is the will of the great Head of the Church, as we surely believe, it is conceivable that He may find means to bring it about even without our wisely conceived and carefully prepared world-wide Conference on Faith and Order. At all events we must not be so engrossed with our own plan as to be oblivious to other and more immediate calls which may be made upon us. These are great times for the upsetting of fixed theories and preconceptions and for the accomplishment of the impossible. The man of the hour, yea, the Church of the hour, is that one who can discern the signs of the times, can read the trend of things and can seize the opportunity as it presents itself. It becomes the wisest and most alert minds in our Church to be wholly alive to the conditions that confront her and to prepare against the meeting of her General Convention, now but a little more than a twelve-months off, such prudent, practical and sufficient measures that she may know her own mind and be prepared to act promptly and with all her power when again called upon to exercise her latent grace of influence and leadership in behalf of the unity of all, or even of some, believers.

Our thanks are returned to kind friends who have furnished us with certain back numbers of the Southern Churchman for which we advertised.

Second Report of the Department of Army and Navy Work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew: In an article from the Brotherhood office which was published last week this report was referred to. The copy sent us, "delayed in transmission," has since been received. It contains a succinct account of the work and the workers at each of the principal Army Camps, a full directory of camps and stations with the representatives of the Church at each, or who are in touch with the smaller stations, a list of Chaplains and other clergy engaged in war work, nearly corresponding with that recently published in these columns, and much other information of the greatest value to those interested in men still in training or likely to be drafted. In conclusion, the report says:

"We cannot close this report without reminding you of the difficult task our Secretaries have been set to do. To inspire and stir men to accept their Christian obligations to their comrades is the hardest sort of work, and the kind that tries their very souls. The mental strain of it, coupled with the physical work of tramping over the camp on foot in all conditions of weather, is such that only those who have the love of God in their hearts and a burning desire to serve their fellowmen can find it possible to endure.

"We acknowledge with thankful appreciation all the help from the Clergy and Laity which has made this work possible. As in our first report, may we again express the hope that the work done merits your approval and is worthy of your continued support. We would that it were possible to tell you of all the souls that have been won for our Lord.

"It is certain that great quantities of seed have fallen in good ground and will bear fruit. To the Great Reaper belongs the harvest. We can but accept from day to day our little task and do our best, praying earnestly that He will use our small efforts to help win the world for Christ."

Names and military addresses of all Churchmen serving their country, also changes in such addresses, should be promptly sent to F. S. Titsworth, Executive Secretary, Army and Navy Department, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, Church House, Philadelphia, Pa.

Books Recommended.

As a rule we do not publish notices of books which we have not ourselves examined. We could not have a better critic, however, than Dr. William C. Sturgis, Educational Secretary of the Board of Missions, who says of the books mentioned below, "I know both of these books well and strongly recommend them to the attention of anyone interested in the topics of which they treat."

Professor Harry F. Ward, of Union Theological Seminary, and Secretary of the Methodist Federation for Social Service, has made the country indebted to him for "The Gospel for a Working World," just published by the Missionary Education Movement.

One of the significant chapters in the book is that which deals with the attitude of labor toward the Church and toward religion, and which indicates the spiritual needs of both capital and labor.

In every discussion of the relation of men to men, it is essential that we place men in the proper relationship to things and that we never subordinate the individual to the material. The great frontier of Christianity now is the frontier of industrial life. The book is a stirring challenge for the Christian forces of the country to extend their lines into this new territory.

"Ancient Peoples at New Tasks," written by Willard Price, editor of "World Outlook," has the splendid graphic style of his magazine. In seven fascinating chapters the new industrial movements sweeping through the Orient, South America and Africa are vividly described.

The sketches that are given us by Mr. Price are such as will be of interest to the general reader who wishes to know of the changing life of the world in an industrial age; at the same time the book is so arranged that it can be used in discussion groups by the multitudes of people who desire to study systematically the relations of Christianity to the world's workers.

Missionary Education Movement, publishers; 160 Fifth Avenue, New York. Each 60 cents cloth, or 40 cents paper.

Ministers as Day Laborers.

About five hundred Christian ministers are known to be at work in munition factories, ship yards or other war industries as day laborers for pay. These ministers are Episcopal, Presbyterian, Methodist, Lutheran and Jew, although there may be others in the number, and they are chiefly in the war industries in cities along the Atlantic seaboard from New Haven on the east to Norfolk on the south. In one case, that of the well-known Jewish rabbi, the Rev. Dr. Stephen S. Wise, money received by the worker is given to charity. In one case in Newark a minister began as a common laborer, but was advanced at once, owing to ability shown.

Reasons given for the step, by some who have been asked, are rarely that of money-making. They are that this is no time to go on vacations—when American boys are on the front; that it is essential to the future careers of ministers that they have records of things actually done to win the war, if they are to have influence with fighting men after their return; and that, there being no opportunities for them to go as chaplains or Y. M. C. A. secretaries, they are determined to do something militant and worth while. A few admit taking up labor to help out finances of their churches, since few interests have suffered loss of income to the extent of churches, owing to absence of supporters gone to war. Some leaders in position to know assert that far more than five hundred ministers are working as day laborers, if full records were kept.

Obey something; and you will have a chance some day of finding out what is best to obey.—Ruskin.

Letters to the Editor

In this department the Editor will at all times welcome communications expressing opinions on the various topics which are engaging the attention of the Church. But the Editor will not hold himself responsible for such opinions.

No "Letter to the Editor" will appear in our columns except over the signature of the writer.

THE UNITY OF THE RACE AND THE UNITY OF THE CHURCH.

Mr. Editor:

The Southern Churchman has printed several letters and articles from the undersigned advocating the two great unities which must be the ideal of the human race if we would escape from the toils of our present encompassing evils.

I quoted at length Bishop Boutflower's article setting forth Bishop Westcott's views as to the senseless vaunting of that sort of nationalism which is selfish, materialistic and mean. While in London recently I heard in St. Paul's Cathedral a sermon from Canon Knox Alexander sharply and clearly accepting Woodrow Wilson's ideal of a league of nations, an international tribunal and disarmament, as the only conceivable ideal for the nations to fight for in the present struggle.

The two unities which I have been advocating in the above mentioned letters are the unity of Christians in One Holy Catholic and Apostolic fellowship; and the unity of the nations in one ecumenical and catholic (using these words in their original Greek sense) federation.

I am prompted to write just now by reading Bishop Gore's wonderfully vigorous plea for these same unities. A secular paper speaks of Bishop Gore, of Oxford, as one "whose influence is probably second to no other scholar in his country."

"We simply cannot face the future without some fundamental repentance or change of mind in the nations—corporate repentance on the widest scale. We cannot face the prospect of peace, patched up with whatever balance of success on one side or the other at the end of this war, which shall leave every nation to expend its resources again in piling up gigantic armaments and entering into rival alliances, ready as soon as an interval of time has supplied a measure of recovered strength, to break out again in renewed war. . . .

"Upon what then can we rely for hope and resolution? The first is the despair of the future which fills the minds of the people of all kinds when they contemplate the tendencies of national rivalry as they existed before the war and led to its outbreak, unless they can be profoundly modified or effectively restrained." He then advocates as a remedy a league of nations.

Now in every city a small police force preserves the peace. Were the people not in full sympathy with this small force's authority, the gigantic titan power of a mob would rise like a French revolution and crush it at any time it wanted. But the consent of the governed gives power to the small group of the police.

In a league of nations a world police force could be appointed. Again the consent of the governed would give authority and effective power to the really intrinsically weak group of ships, guns, men and other agencies which might patrol and police this little globe as effectively as a modern city is protected.

In God's name what nation other than Germany wants to fight any more? Are not tens of millions adequate to satisfy the insatiate man of war?

Of course Mr. H. G. Wells is blankly baldly wrong when he talks about a finite God, and indicates that God could not prevent war if He would. To know more than the omniscient God knows about His own plans is some human wisdom indeed. But we mortals can organize our efforts to prevent, if God wills, millions of deaths, millions of beds of pain, millions of agonizing widows, orphans and grieving parents.

To accept it all as fatalism, inevitable and necessary evil, this is a supine attitude indeed for nations to take who can perform the stupendous tasks that England and our land have performed, the one in four years, the other in one year and a fraction.

When men like Bryce, Balfour, Wilson, Baker, Taft, Clemenceau and others of this calibre put their heads together, we may hope to see real effective plans formed to prevent the recurrence of international bloodshed, and to launch in its stead an era of international peace and harmony. The Christian sentiment of all God's people must be strongly marshaled to this end.

Unity in faith and love, co-operation in prayer and earnest zeal in working together to this great common purpose will weld our Christian forces in every nation, and make us move forward toward that unity for which Jesus our common Lord prayed so fervently and with absolute assurance of His prayer's fulfillment.

DR. HEPBURN AND HIS ANCESTORS.

Mr. Editor:

I think a little leaf from the history of the Church in Kent County may be of interest to the readers of your paper, and especially to friends of the Rev. Dr. Hepburn:

Shrewsbury Parish, Kent County, Md., dates back several years beyond 1698, when an Act of Assembly was passed "for the better division of St. Paul's and Shrewsbury Parishes"; but the earliest extant Record of the Parish is dated November 8, 1701, and relates to the repairs "of the old part of said church." On September 7, 1708, Abraham Redgrave was Lay Reader of the Parish, and on May 27, 1709, Rev. Mr. Sewell was admitted to officiate "until such time as ye vestry shall be otherwise provided by ye Right Honorable and Reverend Father in God, Henry Lord Bishop of London," and on September 23, 1723, Rev. Richard Sewell was inducted rector of the Parish.

The following year Thomas Hepburn became a member of the vestry, and in 1730 James Stavely also became a member. Abraham Redgrave was a member of the vestry in 1701, and was Clerk of the vestry until some years after 1722.

Owing to the changes in Church relations resulting from the Revolution, the Hepburn, Stavely and Redgrave families shortly thereafter lost their connection with the church and parish, and none of those names appear on the record for at least three generations.

Thomas Hepburn married Mary Sewell, daughter of Rev. Richard Sewell. James Stavely's son, John Stavely, married Margaret, daughter of Abraham Redgrave. Their daughter, Mary, married John Hepburn, son of the above mentioned Thomas Hepburn, and their youngest son, Sewell Hepburn, was the father of the present Rev. Sewell Stavely Hepburn.

On June 23, 1918, one hundred and forty-five years after the induction of Rev. Richard Sewell as rector of Shrewsbury Parish, his great-great-grandson, Rev. Sewell Stavely Hepburn, held his first service as rector of Shrewsbury Parish. The blood of these four old church families—Hepburn, Sewell, Stavely and Redgrave—flows in his veins, and he bears the names of three of them. The Sewells and Redgraves are now extinct in Kent County, but the Stavelys are still here and associated with the adjoining parish of I. U., now united with Shrewsbury Parish under its present rector.

Thus his name restores to the Records of Shrewsbury Parish the name of three of these old families, so long and closely connected with its early history. May we not hope this opens a new and auspicious future to both Shrewsbury and I. U. Parishes!

The Rev. Dr. Hepburn was graduated at Washington College, Chestertown, Md., in 1864, and was a student there during a period when I was a young instructor in the college, so that I have had long knowledge of his character and virtues. In 1917, while I was still President of the Board of Visitors and Governors, the old college honored itself by conferring upon him one of the few degrees of Doctor of Divinity, which it has bestowed during its long life of one hundred and thirty-seven years.

He received his theological education at the Virginia Theological Seminary and was ordained deacon in 1869 and priest in 1870 by Bishop Johns in Alexandria, and he has served no less than eighteen country churches, holding the rectorship of from three to six at a time. He is now rector of two parishes and three churches, one a new church completed by him last year at the growing town of Betterton, on Chesapeake Bay, in I. U. Parish.

In the fall of 1906, while at Ashland, he was for a time Secretary of the Virginia Diocesan Missionary Society, and I have heard him say that he would rather hold that position than be the Bishop of any Diocese he knew, because it brought him in direct contact with the clergy and people of thirty-eight counties, and the work of struggling country churches appealed to his sympathy and sense of duty more than any other Church work.

A SUGGESTION FOR COLORED CHURCHMEN.

Mr. Editor:

I would like to make the suggestion, through your columns, that all our Bishops having congregations of colored people in their dioceses, make a special appeal to every one of such congregations to take an offering between now and August, 1919, for Church work in the Republic of Liberia.

August, 1919, will be the 300th anniversary of the landing at Jamestown, in Virginia, of the first African slaves. In view of the marvelous blessings which have come to the negro race in this country during the past three hundred years, it would seem most fitting that the black people should offer up to God such a practical expression of thanksgiving and gratitude. Nor would it be amiss for all of the white congregations to join with their colored brethren in such an offering. In connection with the General Convention at Detroit next year the event could be celebrated and this special offering for African redemption solemnly offered up to God. Any one who has read the magnificent words of Bishop Lloyd with respect to the heroic strivings of the people of the Liberian Republic and their great monetary need can readily understand how very helpful such an offering would prove to the Board of Missions in furthering its new plans for that work.

Vacation Schools.

The vacation schools for children have this year changed their character in many ways, owing to war conditions. The movement, that is headed by the Rev. Dr. R. G. Boville, finds, according to a statement just issued, that boys and girls are neglected in the poor neighborhoods of cities, owing to the war, that more church buildings are closed that ought to be open and in use, and that colleges which heretofore were able to furnish teachers in the vacation season of July and August are able to furnish none at all this year. Finances are more difficult to manage, and the old methods of instruction have had to give way to industrial work related to war needs.

Nevertheless, the statement in question shows tremendous gains in numbers of schools up and down the Pacific coast, in Detroit, St. Paul, Kansas City, Chicago and throughout many cities in New Jersey. For teachers volunteer Christian workers have been pressed into service. Industrial work has been taken up in place of Bible study to some extent. Children are making dresses to send to Belgian children. They are making articles to go into comfort kits for the sailors, and lately they have been supplying rag rugs and socks for Australian soldiers who come by way of Panama and New York on their way to France. In the latter work some co-operation has been had with Canada, where the number of schools has this year doubled in some cities. Co-operation is had with the Red Cross and the Navy League. The growth of the movement has been most marked this season, and its projectors feel it is finding a permanent place. Immediately the war ends renewed efforts are to be made to secure an endowment of $250,000.

No coward soul is mine,
No trembler in the world's storm-troubled sphere:
I see heaven's glories shine,
And faith shines equal, arming me with fear.

O, God, within my breast,
Almighty, ever-present Deity!
Life—that in me has rest,
As I—undying Life—have power in Thee!

Though earth and man were gone,
And suns and universes ceased to be,
And Thou wert left alone,
Every existence would exist in Thee.

There is not room for Death,
Nor atom that His might could render void,
Thou, Thou art Being and Breath,
And what Thou art can never be destroyed.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By the Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

VII. Should the Rector of a Parish Be a Married Man?

Some would answer, No. But many among us think and feel that for settled parish life, where comforts of home life can be provided, the better way is that the rector of a parish should be a man with a family.

The Prayer Book in the ordination of priests seems to contemplate that the priest will ordinarily have a family. But this general rule may have many valid exceptions. An important question is this, "What is the best for an ordinary parish?" As a general rule, is it best that the rector should have a family? The money standpoint should be a secondary consideration.

Now large corporations, employing men for responsible positions, seek the best men to be had for those positions. They want men well qualified to fill them. They want the best men that can be had, not the cheapest that they can get. Should it not be so in the Church? The care of souls. What more responsible position than this? Certainly the money consideration should be a secondary matter. Certainly, then, if it be conceded that, as a general rule, for settled parish life, a married clergyman is best, then ordinarily a qualified married priest should be secured as rector of a parish. There may be exceptions; this would be the general rule.

Conditions in the business world have greatly changed. Family life has been marred in various ways. Husbands and fathers are away from home very much. There are special reasons in our day for upholding the family life. In this our day, as much as in any other age of the Church, there is need that clergy of the Church and their families should "be wholesome and godly examples and patterns for the people to follow." As such, the family of a rector may be very helpful in a parish. In many ways the clergyman's wife may be exceedingly useful.

But when too much has been expected of a clergyman's wife, we hear her say: "I did not marry the parish; I was not hired by the parish." That is true. The rector's wife is not there as a hireling. Neither is the rector in the parish as a hireling. That is a wrong conception of the work of both rector and his wife. He is there for spiritual ministrations as the minister of Christ; and his wife is his helpmeet. The clergyman's wife can enter into the work of her husband in a deeper and more devoted way than most others. "Wholesome examples and patterns to the flock of Christ." The clergyman's wife has an important part in making the family such. It is therefore very desirable that the rector of a parish should ordinarily be a married man. There may be exceptional cases where an unmarried clergyman has such qualities of mind and heart, where he can sympathetically enter into all the joys and sorrows of his people, that his work is equal to that of a married clergyman. But such exceptional cases do not alter the general rule.

Then, further, it is very desirable in many cases that missionaries of the Church should be married. Take the missionaries among Indians. Home life is there very much needed. And it is very desirable that the missionary clergyman should have a home and a family. The wives of many of our missionaries to Indians have, by their devoted labors, been exceedingly useful in nursing and caring for the sick, in teaching children and in guiding the Indian women. And much the same among other missionaries, their wives have been exceedingly useful.

The work of a clergyman in a parish, however, is not as a hireling. The clergyman, with his wife as a helpmeet, is there as the leader in the spiritual work of the Church, according to the divine precept, "Let him that is taught in the word minister unto him that teacheth."

A small parish, weak in numbers and in finances, may think it necessary to get an unmarried clergyman, because he can be gotten cheaper. And that seems to be the chief reason why there is a demand for unmarried clergy, and why many married clergymen are on the non-parochial list. It is a shame that it should be so. The little parish wants a young unmarried clergyman all to itself. The field of labor is small and he can have easy work. Many families have no children and there are only a few children in other families. The field for usefulness is small. In the town there are four, five or perhaps a dozen religious bodies. Some of them also are weak, and they must have help from some mission board to secure a pastor. And so these little churches, our own among the number, squander missionary funds. They make tools of unmarried clergy, and thus keep up their separate existence. Church Unity is needed to solve this situation. But for us, there is a better way to provide for the few faithful people in such a parish. There is a better field for usefulness elsewhere for the unmarried clergyman.

Conditions of modern life have changed and our system needs modification to meet those changed conditions.

THE AMERICAN CHURCH IN PARIS: ITS RELIEF WORK.

From the Rev. Samuel N. Watson, D. D., rector emeritus now of the American Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris, we have two articles, unfortunately overlong for our columns, the one detailing the condition and needs of this great church in these times of stress, and the other rendering an account of the large relief work which has been and is being done by himself and Mrs. Watson and their helpers in connection with the parish. We regret having to abridge.

In regard to the relief work, Dr. Watson reports the expenditure for French and Belgian relief of 233,679.33 francs. This money was contributed chiefly by friends in America; and in addition there has been distributed about sixty thousand articles in kind from the same source. A small amount has gone to assist French and American soldiers. The largest items are for the care of little children. Of these Dr. Watson says:

"Our first thought was for the orphaned children of the war. It is saving the France of tomorrow, this work is, for it keeps the little families together—and the family is France. And next, there are the little children afflicted with bone-tuberculosis, most of whom are curable. There has been a marked increase of this malady of childhood in the last eighteen months of the war; lack of proper food and clothing and fuel has served to reduce the resistance of these little ones.

"We have a committee known as les petit lits blancs, The Little White Beds, which takes these little children and cares for them and brings them back to their homes cured. It is the good care and the wonderful air and the treatment at the Sanatorium Marin of Roscoff in Finistere which does it; and we count the cost as only 3 francs a day per child, and it gives back to France sound bodies of men and women, little men and little women, instead of cripples who are handicapped in the race of life. No help can be brought to France better than this, and we must bring it to them from America."

But there is another class who especially need the thoughtful watchfulness and sympathetic ministering touch of a pastor.

"The needy who are most in our hearts just now, and who will miss us the most until we can go back to them, are the pauvres honteux, the ashamed poor, the gently born and gently bred, who once had everything for comfort and who now have nothing. We have written of them before; we have seen their sufferings winter by winter; and if that was bitter, what will it be this coming winter? Two winters of the war were possible; the third winter the savings began to go; the fourth winter they will be all gone. We could tell hundreds of pitiful stories of families like most of those into which this paper comes, who have lost their all and who have no means of livelihood; they must be helped by those who know them, by those whom they count as their friends; by those who speak their tongue and who have lived among them and are friends of their friends; most often they can only be reached through their friends; they are French and Belgian both, many of them bear family names known to history; they simply cannot go to a Relief Committee—or put it, they simply will not, if you like; and they have given their all for us, and we owe them this friendly hand in their hour of need: they are holding the line for us today from Picardy to the Vosges, just as really as their soldier men are. The large part of the general French relief expenditures we have made this past year has been made for them, and we want to continue it, in the name of our American Christianity: and we feel that there is in that phrase something to touch your hearts and your family feeling, and it is this: Ought not our American Christianity, as such, to be doing some very real thing in France today? Our American Church in Paris is the sole representative of our American Christianity, which in the name of our common Christian heritage, is bringing relief to France, and that, to all who suffer and who have need, regardless of religious or political differences: and we have the written testimony from the leaders of every party in France that this is so. And more and deeper will be the sufferings of those who suffer in France; and more the need that those hurts shall be touched with a sympathetic hand, and, above all, that the relief be brought by those who know the people, who know their family ways, who have their confidence, who have lived amongst them and who help them through their own—who help France to help herself. Believe us, there is no giving like sympathetic, hand-to-hand, personal giving; and more and more must France have this kind of help from those who know her best; and after the war, and for years after, the need will be constant. They are brave and they are proud—too proud to beg; therefore, they suffer the more bitterly, and therefore the need that we bring the help to them."

"And then for Belgium, brave Belgium, just as brave as ever in the depths of her martyrdom: her pauvres honteux and her little ones we must care for, too. It is to the credit of the American Church in Paris that we have always housed a work for Belgian relief: the Oeuvre de Soldat Belge, the first Committee of Relief for the Belgian soldier, was organized in our little Presbytere, and has, from the first weeks of the war, had its offices and its meetings in our parish house. There are the pauvres honteux of Belgium, and they are the orphaned children of Belgium. We want to help to care for them, too. We want to do for the orphans of Belgium something of the same kind of thing that we are doing so successfully for the orphans of France; it means the children kept in a family life, kept with relatives, the home made possible. We can do it now as we could not do it at the first, for now we have the necessary official papers to establish the identity of the children as soldiers' children: just as we have them for the French children. If French war orphans make their pathetic appeal to us, French orphans who have still their France, how infinitely touching the appeal the Belgian orphaned child makes to our sympathy and to our justice; orphaned of father and of home and of country, and who has given all for us. Let us never forget that it was little Belgium who blocked the way, and who still holds her line, brave as France is brave, and each is giving, and has given, all that they had to give in our stead.

"We feel that we have made a wise expenditure of time and money when this could be said to us, just before our sailing: 'Tell your friends and ours in America this from us: Christianity will have another meaning in France because of what you have done here; never again can we go back to our old way of doing; Catholic and Protestant, and all of us, have seen the larger vision of what your American Christianity is and stands for.'

"And this mission of helpfulness we must not let drop; it must be continued, it must be enlarged in scope, for we have been doing a work that no one else does.

The rector and Mrs. Watson are still carrying on the same relief work in France now as while they were in Paris. They have associated with them the same group of faithful co-workers and almoners, French and Belgian friends, with whom they have always worked, with that one idea of sympathetic helpfulness and personal touch in giving. These friends now make the distribution as the money is sent them from this side, and will continue to do so until Dr. and Mrs. Watson can return to France; and when that will be depends on two questions, viz., regaining their health and strength, and obtaining the assurance from their many friends here of the money necessary to do this great work in the name of our Common Christianity, a work which they founded and have such effective means of carrying on now and long after the war. Already many generous pledges have been received, and there is full confidence that this is only the beginning.

That France and Belgium realize the worth of what has been done hitherto is evidenced by the fact that France has made Dr. Watson a Chevalier of the Legion of Honor, and also named him a member of a Governmental Committee of Sixteen, created to distribute the millions voted by the French Parliament for their own war orphans; and has given Mrs. Watson the Medal of the Reconnaissance Française: while King Albert of Belgium has made Dr. Watson a Chevalier of the Order of Leopold, and has sent Mrs. Watson the Medal of Queen Elizabeth: and in the case of both countries it was noted that these distinctions were for services rendered to France and Belgium during this war-time.

Dr. and Mrs. Watson will have as their addresses for the present either in care of Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City; or of National City Bank, Akron, O.; and gifts for their work or communications may be mailed to them at either address. (In case these addresses are lost or mislaid, the Southern Churchman will gladly forward contributions entrusted to our care.)

In another issue we must let Dr. Watson speak of the needs of the American Church in Paris itself.

ACTIVITIES OF THE CHURCH WAR COMMISSION.

By the Secretary.

Bishop Perry went overseas about two weeks ago and is at present taking charge of the Red Cross work in France in the place of Bishop McCormick, who has recently returned to this country. His duties consist in the management of the various Red Cross chaplains in France. He is also the representative of the War Commission overseas.

Bishop Reese, Coadjutor of Southern Ohio, has come to this office and has begun the work of Chairman of the Executive Committee. Bishop Reese will take charge of the duties recently cared for by Bishop Perry. In other words, he will have supervision of the appointment of chaplains, and he will also travel as extensively as possible among the various camps of the country, making a study of each situation, with a view to strengthening the work in the various localities. Bishop Reese may be addressed at the office of the War Commission. He has received leave of absence from his Diocese for six months. In other words, he will be on duty until the first of January.

At a recent meeting of the Commission the following men were elected to the Commission:

The Right Rev. Wilson R. Stearly, D. D., Mr. Charles Steele, Mr. Henry Thompson, Rev. H. B. Washburn.

Dr. Slattery, Mr. Steele and Dr. Washburn were elected to the Executive Committee and Dr. Washburn was made Secretary of the Commission and of the Executive Committee.

The following changes have recently taken place among the civilian chaplains:

The Rev. F. R. Godolphin has left Camp Bowie and has returned to his parish.

The Rev. Francis S. White has completed his work at Waco, Tex., and is about to come to New York and undertake work as one of the Secretaries of the Board of Missions.

The Rev. J. Craik Morris, D. D., has finished his term of service at Fort Oglethorpe and has returned to his parish.

The Rev. H. S. Ruth is assisting the Rev. B. I. Bell at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station.

Rev. W. H. Willard-Jones is beginning his work as chaplain at Camp Perry.

The Rev. Philip Pearson, of Naugatuck, will relieve Civilian Chaplain Bartow at Camp Devens during the month of August, and Civilian Chaplain Smith Dexter in the same camp during the month of September.

The Rev. Cyril Harris, civilian chaplain at Camp Hancock, was ordered to the Army Chaplains' Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor.

The following men have either recently gone abroad or are on the point of doing so:

Bishop Remington, Suffragan Bishop of South Dakota, and the Rev. Everett Pepperel Smith will be Red Cross chaplains in France.

The Rev. Edmund J. Cleveland, who has recently received an army commission.

The Rev. A. L. Washburn, recently chaplain of Base Hospital No. 1, in France, has moved to Paris.

The Rev. Robert N. MacCallum left Camp Wheeler recently, having received an army commission.

The Rev. Thomas Atkinson, Baltimore, Md., and the Rev. E. T. Cobbs, rector of Christ Church, Washington, are engaged in civilian chaplain's work at Fort Oglethorpe.

Chaplain Rollins, who recently came to this country with Associate Headquarters Chaplain Doherty, and who, with Father Doherty, was engaged in the closer association of the chaplains' work on this side with that on the other, has returned overseas.

The question is frequently asked whether there are any vacancies in the ranks of the various chaplaincies. The facts are these: The Episcopal quota for Army and Navy is now full—the Episcopal quota for Red Cross is now full. Orders have been received from the Paris office that no more men of any denomination should be sent until further notice. There are a few vacancies in the civilian chaplaincies, but in almost every case, however, men are under consideration for these vacancies. The waiting lists at the office of the War Commission are already very long.

Frequently also letters are received inquiring as to the financial condition of the various kinds of chaplaincies. Army chaplains receive the salary connected with their rank, likewise with the Navy chaplains. Red Cross chaplains receive the equivalent of 750 francs a month, and if they have dependents, $100 extra a month from the War Commission. Civilian chaplains receive salaries of various amounts depending upon the locality and the sacrifice to which a man is put in abandoning his parish duties to undertake war work.

So far as is possible each chaplain in the Army and Navy, Red Cross and in camps at home is equipped with a portable altar, a Corona typewriter, service books and other things which he may need for the moral and spiritual welfare of his men. Since the beginning of the work of the War Commission they have supplied the following:

One hundred and seventeen thousand service books, eighty-one portable altar sets, one special communion set, fifty-two Corona typewriters.

We have recently received word that the Government decision to withdraw the cross, the distinctive mark of a chaplain, has been reversed and there is no immediate danger of such action now being taken, much to the relief of all chaplains in all branches of the Christian Church.

The War Commission is in need of linen with which to supply the portable altars, that are going out from this office almost every day. Will not the Altar Guilds of the churches make contributions of such linen? The dimensions should be as follows:

Fair linen, 21½ x 14 inches when finished, hem 1 inch.

Corporal, 12 inches square when finished, hem ¾ inch.

Veil, 20 inches square when finished, hem 1 inch.

Pall (card), 5½ inches square.

Burse, 6¾ inches square when finished.

Purificators, 9 inches square.

The Secretary of the Commission has sent letters inquiring about men wounded at the front. His method of ascertaining the facts is to write to the War Commission headquarters in Paris and to get that office to give him whatever information it has at its disposal. In almost every case of inquiry, information has been returned. Occasionally cables of inquiry are sent to the Paris office, but if this method is the one that the inquirer wishes to be pursued he should pay the expense of the cable, for one can readily see that the expense would be prohibitive if this method were pursued in all cases.

The personnel at the office of the Commission has increased from two people regularly on duty at the first of April to six regularly on duty at the present moment. The greater part of the work of the office and of the Commission has to do with the appointments and equipment of chaplains. There are, however, other aspects to the work which are developing every day. The Army and Navy work of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is financed by the War Commission. Propositions for a close affiliation are under way with the Joint Social Service Commission, the Girls' Friendly Society and the Church Periodical Club. Already the War Commission has given generous grants of money to each one of these branches. As a matter of fact, their war work is largely financed by the Commission.

Sincerely yours,
HENRY B. WASHBURN,
Secretary.

14 Wall St., New York,
August 2, 1918.

Manhood's Supremacy.

The greatest need of a nation is for men who have the true ring. They are its most desirable products. Make men, and all the other things will take care of themselves. Someone quotes Admiral Togo as saying that naval superiority must be always based not simply on the material construction of the ships and guns, but on the skill, accuracy and trustworthiness of the men who are behind all the material preparations. That the gunner who is so trained and so skilful as to hit the mark one hundred times out of one hundred shots makes his gun worth one hundred times as much as another's gun, costing just as much, that hits only once in a hundred times.

The shrewd old warrior understands the philosophy as well as the practice of warfare. And what is true in warfare is true in everything else. It is the man that counts. The one great end which is to be given the first place in all of our legislation and planning is the making of truer, nobler, better men. Everything that facilitates this should have our unreserved support. Everything that lowers the tone of manhood should call forth our loudest condemnation, and our strongest opposition. The Church, the school and the polls affords us our three great opportunities.—"Parish Visitor."

Church Intelligence

Hospitality to Soldiers' Mothers and Sweethearts.

More than one hundred business firms in the Madison Square section of New York, Fourteenth to Thirty-fourth Street, have now entered upon one definite form of war work. They have done so through contributions toward expenses, or by personal work by their employees. The commonest form has been the loaning of stenographers for letter writing, designed to make the service known. The list of firms includes banks, the great silk houses, the woolen industries, the missionary societies, the wholesale grocers and the glassware distributors.

The form of work supported by this Madison Square movement is hospitality to soldier mothers of America. Upon request of the Army and Navy Medical Directors an information bureau has been established, by which everybody needing the information can find out at once in what hospital is a particular patient. Notice has been given that by the end of August many wounded boys from the Marne will be in hospitals in and near New York city. The Madison Square hospitality plan is to serve parents of these boys if they visit New York, or where they cannot do so, to provide responsible men and women to take the places of absent parents. These foster parents are certified to the medical directors, under whom they serve.

Co-operating with the Travelers' Aid Society, the National League for Women's Service, the French Commission, the War Camp Community Service, the Red Cross and the Y. M. C. A., this service to soldier mothers has been placed in charge of the Institute of Applied Christianity, with service station at 52 East Twenty-fifth Street, Madison Square, and with bureaus at the Grand Central and Pennsylvania Stations. Inquiries from parents of all men in the service concerning sick sons or concerning any vital matter relating to the welfare of enlisted men are invited, and will be responded to immediately.

Another admirable form of practical war service has been devised by thoughtful people of metropolitan New York, fortunate enough to own homes and not just flats. Hundreds of enlisted men from the West and South, stationed at Camp Merritt, Camp Mills and the many other war centres, that they may be ready to embark at a moment's notice, are engaged to young women of their home towns. About to sail for the front and not certain they will ever return, they want to spend a last few evenings with their sweethearts. Careful parents are unwilling to permit daughters to journey to New York, and stop at hotels or boarding houses, unless they can go with them. Often that is impossible, and so the new form of war work has developed.

This new form is the reception into their homes, as members of their households, of these sweethearts of enlisted men—girls from every part of the country. The father and mother of the New York household acts as parents, some of them for the first time in their lives having marriageable young women on their hands. There are men and women in Brooklyn, the Bronx, Newark, and at least one as far out as Paterson, opening their homes and playing the part of foster parents to would-be brides—brides when the war ends, if all the good luck wishes are realized. The number of American boys engaged to American girls, who have thus been enabled to spend a few evenings with their sweethearts before sailing overseas, is known to run into the hundreds, all through the thoughtfulness and generosity of this new form of war service, and this new use of New York homes.

Red Cross Asks for Dr. Teusler.

Bishop McKim cables from Tokyo that Dr. Rudolph Teusler, director of St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, has been asked by the American Red Cross authorities in Washington to serve as head of the Red Cross unit accompanying the American force going into Siberia. Dr. Teusler, with the hearty approval of Bishop McKim, has accepted the appointment. That the approval of the Board of Missions will be equally hearty is assured by the fact that last November the Board agreed that St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, should be placed at the disposal of the Red Cross as a base hospital in case troops were sent into Eastern Siberia.

Dr. Teusler is a Virginia Churchman who went to Japan as a medical missionary in 1900. In the following year he opened St. Luke's Hospital on a modest scale. By his professional skill, executive ability and winning personality Dr. Teusler has developed St. Luke's until it is now one of the leading Christian institutions of the Orient. For the last five years Dr. Teusler, with the approval of the General Convention and the Board of Missions, and with the co-operation of many friends in Japan and the United States has been working on plans for a great expansion of St. Luke's. Nearly $500,000 have been given in Japan and in this country. Land has been purchased near the present hospital at a cost of about $260,000. When Dr. Teusler returned to Japan last April he took with him the preliminary drawings for the first three units of the new plant. It is estimated that these three will cost about $400,000.

Dr. Teusler's assignment to Siberia will necessitate delay in maturing and executing the far-sighted plans which Bishop McKim and he have been so carefully preparing.

One of the American ambassadors to Japan said some time ago that during the years he represented the United States in Tokyo, no other American in Japan had done so much to interpret Japan and America to each other and to cement the friendship of the two nations as had Dr. Teusler.

Soldier Confirmations.

Official reports to Church authorities prove that a very large number of enlisted men, officers and privates are being received into Church membership while in cantonments, while traveling on transports, and even while on the fighting fronts. It will be recalled that General Pershing was confirmed by Bishop Brent since he went to France. Records at cantonments show that numbers are being received into all churches, Roman Catholic and Protestant. The Bishop Suffragan of New York finds it necessary to remain on duty daily to confirm men in uniform who go to him. One chapel in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine is in almost weekly use. On the last Sunday in July, in Trinity Church, the Bishop confirmed twenty-six men from one transport.

A considerable part of this unusual summer accession of men is due to the routing of ships in the war. England is bringing Australian and New Zealand troops across the Pacific, through the Panama Canal, and over the Atlantic under American convoys to France and Italy. On the long voyages the chaplains prepare men for confirmation. It is an unusual experience for the men and for churches. Records of new members are being swelled materially.

It is found that Romanists and most Protestant bodies are receiving new members in the same way. Already records of men so far this year beat all previous records by half. Yet few so-called evangelists are among the preachers at cantonments. Those most in demand and oftenest sent forth by the religious bodies are preachers of ability, who also come into personal contact with the men. Very much more than in former times is all of the work social in its character.

The Northfield Convention.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew men will not forget the Thirty-third National Convention to be held at Northfield, Mass., Wednesday, August 14th, to Wednesday, August 21st. The Brotherhood office has an excellent schedule of "the best train connections," which we suppose will be sent to inquirers. The Secretary writes:

"We are looking forward to having a very wonderful gathering, even in this off year; we are rather surprised at the number of reservations already in, and the indications are the attendance will be good. We have a splendid program and a splendid array of speakers. The latest addition is Bishop McCormick, by the way."

The Church Pension Fund, after the action of the Executive Committee on July 30, 1918, had in force two hundred and sixteen pensions, including grants to orphans, of an annual amount of $93,549.37. These pensions have been granted since the pension system started operations on March 1, 1917, and are in accordance with its rules. In addition the Church Pension Fund has assumed General Clergy Relief Fund grants and grants of Diocesan Relief Funds which bring the total of the grants which it is paying on August 1, 1918, up to the annual amount of $260,591.37.

One of the grants made on July 30th is of special interest. It is to the widow of Captain, the Rev. Henry L. Jewett Williams and her little daughter. The Rev. Mr. Williams was a member of the faculty of the University of the South, but shortly after the United States entered into the war he felt it his duty to offer his services to his country, and received a commission as captain in the army. He was killed, fighting valiantly with his troops in France, on June 9th of this year, probably the first clergyman of our Church to meet death in battle with the American troops in this war.

The Church will appreciate the honor of having the name of the widow of this noble clergyman and soldier upon the roll of the Church Pension Fund.

A Joint Campaign: To finance the war work for next year the Y. M. C. A. will need $97,000,000 and the Y. W. C. A. $15,000,000. Upon the advice of John R. Mott and other leaders it has been decided to combine these campaigns and make one drive for the entire $112,000,000, and the separate States are being organized for the campaign, which will probably be in October.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. B. D. Tucker, D. D., Bishop.
 Rt. Rev. A. C. Thomson, D. D., Suffragan.

Christ Church, Pulaski: Special fifteen-minute war-prayer services were instituted daily some time ago by the rector, the Rev. Thomas F. Opie, and considerable interest has been shown in them. They are held every evening at 7:30 o'clock, when intercession is made for our country and our President, our men in the service, the cause of the Allies, for victory and for peace. The rector has been made Chairman of the Home Service Section, American Red Cross, for the county. This organization looks after the families and dependents of men in the service and the rejected men, advising with them on subjects of health, finance, rent, correspondence, etc. During the summer Mr. Opie has been assisted by Mr. R. A. Macgill, of Philadelphia, who is attending the William and Mary Summer School at Dublin, near here. Mr. Macgill was connected with the Galilee Mission in Philadelphia for three years, and on next Sunday he will make an address on the Church's rescue missions. Mr. Macgill will enter the Virginia Seminary this fall, to prepare himself for the ministry. Mr. Opie has started a mission at the Gossan mines, near Galax, and will hold services there once a month.

VIRGINIA.

Rt. Rev. R. A. Gibson, D. D., Bishop.
 Rt. Rev. W. C. Brown, D. D., Coadjutor.

The Transportation Committee of the City Missionary Society of Richmond arranged an automobile ride for the twenty-seven students in the Home Service Training Institute on the evening of August 1st. These ladies, who are volunteering their services to the Government to do Red Cross work in the Potomac Division, had spent six weeks in Richmond, almost entirely in the slums and inspecting city and charitable institutions. Automobiles were furnished for this occasion from five of the Richmond churches, which are now co-operating heartily in the numerous activities of the City Missionary Society.

The Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, will be at his father's home near the White Sulphur Springs, W. Va., for the next two or three weeks.

The Rev. A. Vaughan Colston will be in charge of St. Paul's Church, Richmond, during the month of August.

The Rev. G. Peyton Craighill, who spent the month of July at his camp in Goshen Pass, has resumed his regular services at Epiphany Church, Barton Heights, Richmond.

The Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, rector of Grace Church, Richmond, is spending his vacation at Leesburg and Orkney Springs, Va., where the Rev. Dr. J. J. Gravatt, rector of Holy Trinity Church, is also finding recreation.

The Rev. W. Russell Bowie, Chaplain in the Red Cross, who has been spending some time with his family at Cape Cod, expects to sail shortly for France.

The Rev. James D. Gibson, rector of St. Stephen's Church, Westhampton, Richmond, has been appointed by the War Commission Chaplain of the Hospital for Convalescent Soldiers near Richmond.

The Rev. and Mrs. G. Walter Williams, of Richmond, are spending the month of August at their former home, Poolesville, Md.

The Rev. F. A. E. Warren, of Ginter Park, is in charge of the services at Holy Trinity Church, Richmond, during the absence of the rector, the Rev. Dr. J. J. Gravatt.

CONNECTICUT.

Rt. Rev. C. B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop.
 Rt. Rev. E. C. Acheson, D. D., Suffragan.

Diocesan Items of Interest.

There is no retrograde march in this Diocese. Despite the noble clergy that have volunteered in the service of our country, parochial and mission work moves on for all that. The Rev. Drs. Miel, of Hartford, and Lewis, of Waterbury, are in France, doing well their "bit"; Chaplain E. C. Thomas, in the army, may be overseas at any time, the Rev. George L. Paine, of New Haven, is awaiting orders, and the Rev. L. C. Sherburne has resigned St. James' Parish, Poquetanuck, to accept a secretaryship with the Y. M. C. A.; Chaplain W. P. Williams continues in the important work at Great Lakes. East and West, on sea and shore, these men are the friends of man.

The Rev. H. S. Harte is locum tenens at St. Paul's, New Haven, during the rector's absence, until January; and the Rev. George A. Alcott, having resigned Grace Church, New Haven, is now rector at East Haddam. A son of the Rev. A. T. Randall, Meriden, in the service in France, has been wounded. The Rev. J. F. Sexton has two sons in France, and others of our clergy have sons in the service of our country.

The Rev. W. T. Hooper, some time assistant to the Rev. J. W. Bradin, in St. John's, Hartford, has succeeded to the rectorship, and Mr. Bradin, after thirty-six years, becomes rector-emeritus. Likewise, the Rev. Samuel Sutcliffe has been elected rector of St. Mark's, New Britain, and the Rev. Harry I. Bodley, rector-emeritus. These are important parishes, and the new rectors are well prepared for their opportunities.

Southington, during the last two years, has suffered serious losses by death. The Rev. W. D. Williams, D. D., publishes a parish paper, "The Messenger," from which we learn that St. Paul's Church, during this same period, inaugurated an endowment fund, starting with a $1,000, and the total bequests are now $15,200; the latest legacy was that of $12,500, from Mr. M. B. Willcox, who died July 16th in his home at Southington.

SOUTHERN FLORIDA.

Rt. Rev. Cameron Mann, D. D., Bishop.

Florida Makes Banner Record in War Work.

According to Bishop Mann, of Southern Florida, his State has made a banner record in the war to date. In a communication just made by him he points out that Florida has nothing to sell that war needs buy, such as iron to make ships, wool to make uniforms, or leather to make shoes. Its products are, according to the Bishop, such as the Government passes by in its war equipment. At the same time the things it does produce are hard hit by the war. Caring for rich folks in fine hotels, providing rare fruits, fishing for tarpon—all these the war put a damper on. The Bishop is of the opinion that hardly another State in the Union is so circumstanced by the ups and downs of the war.

Yet Florida's record, thinks Bishop Mann, leads in some respects every other State. He believes that Sarasota, a village with 800 and an enlistment of fifty young men in the service, holds perhaps the banner of the country. He reports subscriptions to the Liberty Loan and Red Cross to be beyond the record of most States of the South, while he finds that churches in his district which he had expected to cry out about finances are meeting their obligations without complaints of any kind. Some of them have broken all previous records in the way of money contributions to outside causes. The Bishop regards this showing as the more remarkable when he recalls that Christian and civic workers have left Florida for the front to a proportion hardly reached, he estimates, by any other State.

What Is a Christian?

Christianity is kept alive because some men and women have had real religious experience. The hangers-on of religion, the more or less half-and-half Christians, the pagans who retain some strains of Christianity, are really people who get warmth from a fire but are not on fire themselves. The true sources of any real religious vitality are people who have felt and experienced the Divine touch. They are the fire.

Now, millions don't know this. They think religion means believing something told them on authority, whether by the pope or by the Church. Now, I am not denying that for many people this reliance on others is a starting-place or a prop of religion, but I maintain that, if this was all, religion would not survive long.

Unshaken and unshakable Christians—and any really religious people—believe, and cannot be put out of countenance, because they have felt and experienced the Divine. Some have experienced conversion—the sudden invasion and inrush of a personal supernatural influence into their hearts. It is no merit of theirs; it simply happens.

Others find in prayer or meditation a sense of peace, of help, of strength, which assures them they are on the right lines and are in touch with a higher Power than themselves.

Others live by a Divine standard. They try, by God's help, to be honest and pure and kind. They find their reward. They do not get the Old Testament rewards of abundance of camels and sheep and man servants; on the contrary, sooner or later they suffer with Christ—for the world is redeemed by the sacrifice of the best, not the worst—but they have as their reward a clear conscience, a spiritual cupboard empty of skeletons, an inward peace and security, and a felt right relationship to the high and holy Powers of heaven.

These are the people who underwrite religion. These are the break-water against which secular and atheistic writers break helplessly and will always break. For their religion does not depend on the date of Genesis, the morality of Jael or criticisms "higher" or "lower," or even on the undoubted importance of facts like the almost universal instinct for religion. It depends on an experience which nothing can touch.—Rev. Walter J. Carey.

Personal Notes

The Rev. E. Steirling Gunn, rector of Immanuel Church, Winona, Miss., who is supplying at St. Luke's Church, Atlanta, Ga., during the absence of the rector, is also rendering voluntary service at Camp Gordon.

The Rev. Howard M. Stuckert, who has accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Holy Comforter, Haverford Avenue and Forty-eighth Street, Philadelphia, Pa., will take up his new work on September 1st.

The address of the Rev. Louis H. Ewald is changed from Frederick, Md., to Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, N. D.

The address of the Rev. R. K. Yerkes is changed from Philadelphia, Pa., to Box 247, Merion, Pa.

The Rev. J. W. Bleker, of Fitzgerald, Ga., has been called to the rectorship of St. Peter's Church, Fernandina, Fla.

The Rt. Rev. Edwin S. Lines, D. D., has entirely recovered from his recent illness and has returned to his residence in Newark, N. J.

The Rev. Dr. Edward D. Johnson, rector of St. Anne's Church, Annapolis, Md., has charge of the services at the United States Naval Academy during the vacation of Chaplain Evans.

The Rev. W. Strother Jones, D. D., assistant minister in St. Thomas' Church, New York City, owing to ill health, is taking a much-needed rest in Virginia, and may be addressed 611 Prince Street, Alexandria, Va.

The Rev. Churchill J. Gibson, rector of R. E. Lee Memorial Church, Lexington, Va., will leave on August 23d for the Chaplains' School at Louisville, Ky., for five weeks' training, after which he will return to his parish and await orders from the Government.

Ordinations.

In the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, Long Island, N. Y., on July 23d, Bishop Burgess advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Allen D. Jennings, who was presented by the Rev. J. C. Jones, D. D. The Bishop preached the sermon, and other clergy present and taking part in the service were Dean Treder, Canon Swett, Archdeacon Webb and the Rev. George E. Talmage. Mr. Jennings will continue his work at the Naval Reserve Base at Bath Beach, and hopes shortly to receive his commission as naval chaplain.

Deaths.

The Rev. David Walter Bland died at his home in Camden, N. Y., on July 9th, after a brief illness, aged sixty years.

The Rev. Eugene J. Babcock, former rector of Christ Church, Lockport, N. Y., died at his home in Lockport on July 15th, aged sixty-eight years.

The Rev. Shim Yin Chin, missionary minister in charge of St. John's Chinese Mission, Kula, Island of Maui, Hawaiian Islands, died on June 27th, after a brief illness. Funeral services in Chinese were held in St. Andrew's Cathedral on June 30th, interment being made at Makiki Cemetery.

The Rev. Arthur Paul Kelley, formerly rector of St. Stephen's Church, Westboro, Mass., who has been serving with the American Army in France for a year, is reported to have died of disease in France. At the time of his death he was serving as first sergeant in the 103d Ambulance Corps, 101st Sanitary Train.

Slackers and Deserters.

Do you realize what your membership in the Church means? It is very evident from the behavior of some that it is not realized or cared about. Let us see what it means. God has a great war being waged against the world, the flesh and the devil. God's army is the Church. At baptism you were set aside and destined for this army. There it was promised, among other things, that you would be a "faithful soldier" of Jesus Christ. Confirmation is your own personal enlistment in this army. You voluntarily at that time take up the soldier's life in the army of God.

There are certain well-defined features of any army. Its soldiers must be loyal to the limit. They must be willing to be sacrificed for the cause. There must be ideals or standards to which the soldiers are called to conform, and there must be a certain system of discipline. Now, the army of God has its ideals and its discipline as set forth in its sacred seasons and services, and work and affairs, and the Church, as the army of God, expects a profound loyalty to these ideals on the part of every soldier in that army.

Do you support these ideals? Do you conform to this discipline? Can you say that you are loyal to the work and worship and welfare of the Church?

The curse of the Christian Church today is its multitude of slackers and deserters. Our Lord's prophecy is fulfilled: "A man's enemies shall be they of his own household." The worst and most dangerous enemies of the Church are her slackers and deserters. They are the ones who humiliate, disgrace and weaken her in the eyes of the world.

The slackers are those who stand back and let others do the work of the Church and fight her warfare. Many of them are among the most regular attendants upon her services, but that costs little. The deserters are those who, having been confirmed and taken their oath of loyalty, have wandered away from the service and work of the Church. If you were a slacker in the army of the United States, you would be disgraced in the eyes of society and severely disciplined by the government. And if you were a deserter in the United States Army you would be tracked to your hiding place, court-martialed and put to death. But that is not God's method. Infinite patience and hope are a part of His nature. No matter how faithless or how disloyal one may be, He still hopes and waits for a change of heart. You are still His child, though faithless. And He still says over you, in the words of the prophet: "O, Ephraim, how can I give thee up?"—Rev. R. S. Coupland, D. D.

"Forgiveness is the only word that fits our case. If sin is disease, we may talk of medicine; if it is weakness, the remedy is strength; if it is ignorance, we must seek wisdom; but if sin means guilt, nothing but forgiveness will set us right with God."

God never denies Himself to the honest seeker. There may be dreary tracts to traverse, steep paths to tread, dark ways to pass, but if the honest heart is there the day of discovery will surely dawn.—J. D. Jones.

Christianity and the Community

Thy Kingdom Come on Earth

THE REV. R. CARY MONTAGUE, Editor

KEEPING THE HOMES ABREAST OF THE SOLDIERS.

We take pleasure in publishing the following announcement of the work that has been done for the past six weeks in one of the leading cities of the South.

These schools for Home Service take the place in the general economic and social life of the nation, that is filled by the Officers' Training Camp in our military organization.

These women are being trained to become leaders in their communities, to uplift and enlarge the vision of our home people so that when our boys come back from France they will find that their sisters, mothers and fathers have not been standing still while they have won the war.

The third Red Cross Home Service Institute which the School of Social Work and Public Health in Richmond has given for the Department of Civilian Relief of the American Red Cross closed on Saturday, August 3d. This is a very unusual type of training school. Twenty-seven students were registered. Practically all of these were women who have volunteered for service in connection with the civilian relief work with the families of the soldiers and sailors. These ladies come from three States—Virginia, West Virginia and Maryland. Some of them are from larger cities, such as Lynchburg, Va., and Wheeling and Charleston, W. Va., and others from rural counties, as Accomas County, Buchanan and Giles Counties, Va., and Charles County, Md. The coming of these ladies to Richmond to take this work is evidence of the great stimulus which the war has given to the development of social work in the South and throughout the whole country. Probably never before has there been so much interest in the rural and outlying sections in social work, as there is now in the relief and care of the families of soldiers and sailors. The inspiration and training which these ladies will take back with them will be of the greatest possible service.

The work began on June 24th and lasted for six weeks. It included lectures by the leading social workers and public health officials of Richmond, as well as officials from the Potomac Division of the Red Cross. Dr. L. M. Bristol, of the University of West Virginia, also delivered a series of lectures during the first three weeks of the institute. The field work supervision was under the direction of Miss Loomis Logan and Miss Lucy Witt.

The School of Social Work and Public Health which is giving this course also gives two other courses which will be of interest to the people of the South. Beginning on October 1st, it will offer a four months' course of training for public health nurses. This is open only to graduate nurses who desire to train themselves for health work in the small towns and rural districts and factory villages of the South. In addition the school also offers a course of training in preparation for social service. This course prepares for positions of responsibility, such as probation officers and juvenile court workers, protective work with girls, health visitors, recreational, playground and industrial welfare workers, travelers' aid, charity organization, church and relief work, etc. Social work is now a recognized profession with definite salaries of from $75 to $100 per month to begin with. Dr. H. H. Hibbs, Jr., director of the School of Social Work and Public Health, states that he is repeatedly called on to fill positions of the kind described above, but they have found it impossible to find enough workers trained for these positions. Social service is one of the most important kinds of applied religious work. It is hoped that the Christian women of the South will be able to take this course of training to prepare them for these positions. Dr. H. H. Hibbs, 1112 Capitol Street, Richmond, will give full information.

The Home Service Institute which is just closing is largely for the training of volunteers who return to their home communities and give their services for a part of their time without remuneration. Dr. Hibbs states that what is needed is paid workers who can go wherever they are sent and give their full time on salary.

FAMOUS HUNGER STONE VISIBLE FOR FIRST TIME DURING WAR.

Amsterdam, July 20.—The famous "hunger stone" in the River Elbe near Tetschen, which, according to popular belief in Germany, predicts a famine when seen, is now visible for the first time since the beginning of the war.

The stone lies in the bed of the river and has never been visible save at exceptionally low tide. On the stone is chiseled in old German: "When ye see me, ye will weep."

It is significant of the fact that the tide has turned in the mighty world struggle that the above report should come out of Germany within a week of the issuance by Food Administrator Hoover of an order releasing us from wheatless days.

The time may come when we shall have to feed Germany as well as our Allies, and we must remember that when that time does come it will be the opportunity for America to show its largeness of soul and true belief in the Master's teachings.

It is because this time is coming that we have, through these columns, tried to keep the Church at the forefront of the fight while the fight lasts, so that when the time for dispensing mercy arrives her voice will have the greater influence.

It is the call of the leader, and not the plea of the laggard that will be heeded in the hour of victory.

DO A LITTLE INVESTIGATING.

Appeals for help for war aims is always good, but sometimes we may let our zeal run away with wisdom, as is shown from the following experience of a New York nurse who had need for slippers to be used among convalescent soldiers:

She induced an editor to make an appeal. The response has been so liberal that slippers have come by every parcel post since. A woman, working in a hospital on Governor's Island in New York harbor, found need for canes. She sent out an appeal, and canes with curved ends and straight, canes of wood and of metal, canes with gold heads and canes with ivory, have been arriving ever since. Now both war hospital workers venture to suggest that friends of soldiers responding to appeals inquire about the need before sending the goods. They say interest is so great that almost any appeal for soldiers' wants is likely to be responded to many times over.

LEST WE FORGET.

The intelligent interest that is now being taken in work for the crippled and maimed soldiers, both by the Government and by individuals, is splendid and will have a beneficial influence which will reach far beyond its immediate objects.

In studying to help these heroes of war we must not forget the heroes of peace. The men who lose sight, hearing or limbs in our coal mines, saw mills and on the railroads are doing just as much to maintain the American home as our boys who meet with these injuries on the battlefields.

Who knows but that this war may be one of God's means for drawing our attention to these heretofore neglected individuals.

Such assistance as has been rendered in these cases in the past has always been done more impulsively than thoughtfully, and the aid rendered has always been of a temporary nature in consequence.

The sane view is always the long view, and while the giving of money to an afflicted person may relieve the temporary necessity, it cannot compare in real usefulness to the proper training of that individual permanently to help himself, and restore himself to normal activities.

In this connection it is most interesting to know that our Saviour never gave charity, but always restored the body to that active life from which affliction had taken it.

This new governmental activity for wrecked human bodies is only one of the many ways in which we are coming into the vision of our great Leader in social service.

The multi-millionaire owner of a famous patent medicine was once asked by a friend to tell him in confidence just what was in his remedy.

The owner obtained a pledge of secrecy, and then with a glance over his shoulder to be sure there were no eavesdroppers, he whispered: "Mostly profit."

Matt. 11

Eleventh Sunday after Trinity: The exhortation of Moses that closed the lesson for last Sunday morning, to-wit, that we should depart from God's word neither on the right hand nor on the left, would seem to have guided the leaders of the Church of England during the Reformation. They escaped the two pitfalls of legalism and anti-nomianism: legalism, which is constrained obedience to the letter of the law; anti-nomianism, which is disobedience to law, separation of religion from life and from morality. Thus the Collect for today speaks of the grace of God not as something which saves a sinner in his sin, but as a power which enables one to attain inner, spiritual obedience and to become a partaker of God's heavenly treasure. In the gospel, our Lord shows by a parable more clearly than can be done by logical exposition, the state of mind, the penitence, humility and faith, that lead to justification, or right relation to the source of life and power; while the Epistle gives a concrete illustration in the case of St. Paul, who became what he did become through the grace of God revealed in Christ Jesus our Lord. He, too, warns against the idea which so besets not only protestantism but orthodoxy as a whole, that faith in the sense of belief in a creed can possibly save: "by which ye are saved, unless ye have believed in vain." This same combination of grace and obedience runs through the Old Testament lesson for Sunday morning; with, of course, an Old Testament background. It is, apparently, the introduction to the chapter that follows and which is given for next Sunday morning, containing the covenant made with the children of Israel besides that made at Horeb. But what is stressed in this chapter is obedience based upon their redemption from Egypt and the certainty of punishment in the case of disobedience. The entirely practical character of all revelation is brought out in the closing verse: revelation is limited; there is a place for a true agnosticism; and what is revealed is for a very practical purpose, "that we may do all the words of this law." The second lesson also develops the idea of salvation by grace: "God . . . who hath saved us not according to our works, but according to His own purpose and grace." There is contained in this selection one of the things which had been "secret" in the days of Moses, but revealed later on, the life and immortality brought to light through our Lord Jesus Christ; not only immortality, but "life (i. e., spiritual life) and immortality."

The New Testament evening lesson, the story of the Syrophenician woman, is keyed rather to the subject of prayer (tenth and twelfth Sundays after Trinity) than to that of grace and obedience, yet is not a bad illustration of that "almighty power" of God which is declared "chiefly in showing mercy and pity." The Old Testament lesson follows the Collect yet more closely in dealing with the real "heavenly treasure" here in this world, which is wisdom and which is acquired by cultivating the inner life. With the young it begins by honoring parents and needs discipline for its further development. "As he thinketh in his heart so is he" might almost be called the keynote of much modern psychology. As always, week-day selections may be substituted for the Sunday ones, and in this case Job 14 and Mark 12:13-40. make a good pair.

Flee from Evil.

Who can answer the question, Whence and how came evil into our world? One poet says: "Evil is only another form of good. . . . Out of evil still educing good." In this view, evil would seem to be a discipline for greater good. This would be true of suffering, but not of sin. But the heart of humanity feels that evil ought not to be; that it must be overcome, or the universe will be a failure. Evil is possible to every human soul, and arises from the freedom of the will and from the power of choice. Satan fell from the heavenly estate seeking to usurp divine power; he chose rebellion instead of obedience. Almighty God had the choice of creating men or machines, and He decided to make man in His own image, and for His eternal family and fellowship. Man, being a creature of freedom, has the power to cast false witnesses and blasphemy." Here evil from His universal kingdom of righteousness. Our Lord knew the source of evil when He said, "Out of the heart proceed evil thoughts, murder, adulteries, fornications, thefts, himself down the chasm of sinfulness, or to rise to goodness and greatness under the shadow and blessing of the Almighty Father. The moral law is God's own individual nature. It could not be different. His throne would fall, endorsing evil. God ever says, "Thou shalt not." Man replies, "I will."

Eternal justice must finally banish is the reason why a soul must be born again into the kingdom of heaven, free from evil. As a judge must condemn a guilty criminal, so the Almighty must condemn the unrepentant sinner. He must protect His government against treason and rebellion if He would preserve peace eternally in His universe.—Christian Herald.

Life's Loveliness.

Think lovely thoughts, that every day be blest;

Look thou for God, nor fancy Him concealed;

Along earth's common way the flowers and grass

Will breathe His name to thee when thou shalt pass,

To thy divinest self He stands revealed, His conquering power through love made manifest.

Speak lovely words, to fall like sunlight rays,

That youth may be so long and age but brief,

To add to joy in life a little more, And take some misery out of earth's vast store,

So shalt thou walk with gladness and not grief,

Planting a hope in all the thorny ways.

Do lovely deeds, of brotherhood the bond: Each burden nobly lifted and each task,

Each day's plain duty teaches thee to bless

The friendless lives brave in their loneliness,

Ere yet they near the Shadows and the Mask,

And those untrodden paths that stretch beyond.

Thoughts, words and deeds! To stand for truth in all!

This is the creed that counts, Unflinching toil,

Stanch fortitude and strength of patience born,

Securely treading, though the way be worn,

Fronting the light, nor fearing to recoil,

Facing the right, nor looking back to fall.

For the Southern Churchman.

The Strength of Stillness.

When Dr. Burt overtook the lagging pedestrian that he had recognized from afar as Mrs. Lindsay, a newcomer in Singleton, he drew rein and spoke a little peremptorily.

"There isn't a shade tree for another mile," he said, "and this August sun is not bracing. Better let me give you a lift."

He looked quizzically at his passenger as she climbed into the dusty buggy without allowing him time to descend. Country doctors are often shrewd students of human nature. Their business is with man's body, to be sure, but in much traveling along rough roads and much passing to and fro over worn family thresholds they contract a habit of pondering deeply that even more complex problem, man's soul.

"She's glad enough to accept," he recorded, mentally. "Now, why in common sense should she trudge backwards and forwards between Clifford and Singleton day after day—particularly when she could well afford a rig?" He knew that only some strong impulse was sending this young-old woman, with the step of a girl and the graying hair and lined mouth of age, on her ceaseless patrol of a strange countryside.

"Botanizing?" he hazarded.

Mrs. Lindsay tucked the old linen robe around her with fidgetty, fluttering fingers. "O, no," she said. Her two hands went out with a little despairing gesture. "Just restless—just trying to walk things down."

The driver flicked his plodding mare with a tentative whip-end. "Things?" he queried, doubtfully. "You'll get sunstroke. What things?"

Again the little gesture of dismay. "O, everything! The war, chiefly—the storm and stress and turmoil of the world that used to be so sane. Suffering over yonder and suffering here. Who can dream how it will end? And now, my only son—"

Her voice grated and then broke. The physician knew that break; he had heard it a score of times in the past twelve months. Sometimes it hurt him; sometimes it braced him. Today it left him slightly cold. The buggy creaked on in the deep sand.

"I know what you are going to say," Mrs. Lindsay continued. "That I am not alone in my troubles; that I should not cross bridges ahead of time; that it's darkest before dawn, and all that. I'm fed up on those saws. But they don't help; they hinder."

"Do you have any work to do?" asked the doctor abruptly.

"O, too much. In the hope of getting away from myself and taking up new interests I came to Singleton to board for a month. Now I find myself as much with me as ever; and as for the interests, they are somewhat overpowering. I've plunged into the war relief play and the Red Cross work in the two villages, and everything else that came along, and it has all gone wrong. That's one reason I'm going to Clifford, now, to straighten out some hopeless snarls. The wool for the knitting is hung up at the express office—some hitch in the ordering; the play hasn't been half rehearsed, and I have decided to resign the job of prompter. Then I mailed last letter to Richard, my son, in Clifton, and I don't believe he ever got it; that post-office is surely crooked."

Her tone grated again, fretful and edgy. The doctor did not reply; he was tabulating her in his mind. "Not born neurotic," he decided. "Just lost grip of herself."

The voice at his side went on. "My husband and boy worry over me," it said. "I left John for a month in order to give him a little recess." She tried to laugh. "As for Richard, his last letter said, 'Don't hurry so and worry so, mother. Even your handwriting seems running to catch a train.' Dr. Burt, I want you to give me a tonic."

"All right," Dr. Burt assented, absently. He fell into a brown study, and there was silence for the remainder of the drive.

When they drove into Clifford the doctor spoke. "It's too hot for you to walk to the express office. But I'll have to get you to make my rounds with me before I can take you." Without waiting for her answer he pulled up before a plain gray cottage. When the horse had been tied he paused uncertainly at the side of the buggy. "I wish you'd come in here with me," he said. "You could talk to Miss Anne while I see my patient upstairs."

Mrs. Lindsay drew back. "Who is Miss Anne?" she asked.

The doctor saw her unwillingness and turned away with a shrug. "O, just Miss Anne," he said, somewhat curtly. "Last name Brown, I believe. But never mind."

Mrs. Lindsay found herself crawling out of the vehicle with some meekness; in silence she followed her grizzled conductor to the house.

Miss Anne, whoever she might be, occupied a chair on the front porch. She did not rise, but nodded, smiling, at the doctor's brief introduction. "More pain," Mrs. Lindsay said to herself, half angrily. "She is evidently helpless. Why should Dr. Burt foist this on me?"

But Miss Anne looked happy and expectant, and with an inward groan the visitor settled herself to conversation. The woman in the invalid's chair faintly roused her curiosity. Was she young or old? The hair was quite gray, and the brow beneath it bore the unmistakable stamp of suffering, but about her whole appearance there was something indefinably glad—the eyes, perhaps. Mrs. Lindsay decided that it was the eyes.

"How good of the doctor to bring you," said Miss Anne. "I knew of you, and now I shall know you yourself." She radiated pleasure. The guest found herself moved with an odd sense of well-being and satisfaction.

An hour later, when she was again in the buggy beside the doctor, headed toward the end of the straggling village, a question slid out before she knew it. "Miss Anne, back yonder," she said, "is it—is it merely temporary?"

"No," answered Dr. Burt. After a slow moment he amended the monosyllable tersely. "Twenty-five years."

His companion shrank a little. "Not twenty-five years like that?" she faltered. Her two hands went out as if in appeal.

The doctor's brusque voice held a softened note. "Just like that. Paralysis, following a severe illness. All sorts of complications to that case," he added, half to himself.

The plodding horse made another long block. Then, "what does she do?" Mrs. Lindsay asked. "What can she do?"

"She can't do anything," was the reply, "if you mean by that what ordinary people do. She can't walk alone, she can't use her hands at all, she can't even read; she can only sit in that chair. And yet, somehow—" He did not finish the sentence; his mind seemed suddenly to turn in on itself.

When the buggy stopped again—at the Powell home this time—Mrs. Powell entertained the doctor's companion while he went upstairs to her sick husband. Evidently Clifford town had a warm place in its heart for even the semblance of a guest. This proved a long visit, for Dr. Burt went afoot from the Powell sick-room to other patients nearby, and Mrs. Lindsay waited his pleasure. When finally the buggy was creaking back toward Singleton the sun showed low in the west.

Again Mrs. Lindsay was the first to speak. "It's queer how things come up," she said. "Your Miss Anne was almost the main topic of our conversation there."

"Nothing queer about that."

"But I hadn't even mentioned her! Mrs. Powell was reading me letters from her two young brothers in France, and they both referred to her."

"Of course they did," said Dr. Burt. "Miss Anne's the heart of Clifford. Half a dozen young chaps in France would tell you that. Odd how she keeps connected up with them—can't even write letters to 'em. And we stay-at-homes—why, I don't know, I just can't seem to see, daily life in these parts without Miss Anne."

Here a garrulous traveler in another vehicle made a long interruption. When the journey was at length resumed, Mrs. Lindsay's next comment seemed almost irrelevant. "Her face shines," she said, meditatively.

"Sort o' like a lighthouse with restless tides all around it," Dr. Burt agreed. "Somebody said once, like a still lake with a star in it. But shucks, I'm not strong on poetry; lighthouse suits me."

Mrs. Lindsay smiled to herself. "One of Mrs. Powell's brothers almost said that, in a boyish way. He wrote that sometimes, going over, the ocean was as still and beautiful and full of light as though there had never been a storm or a submarine. 'Still and bright as Miss Anne,' he ended. 'That's the nearest I can come to it.' The other one said, 'Don't you worry, Sis. When you get fussed up about us go and see Miss Anne.'"

"Always so," the doctor commented, briefly.

After awhile a little slow shadow passed over Mrs. Lindsay's face; it settled and darkened. "Well, that's beautiful," she said, "but then . . . your Miss Anne hasn't an only son far away from her in the very jaws of death."

"She has an only brother there," was the answer, "that she brought up from his early babyhood. I'll wager she never has a thought free of him."

"Ah, but that is not altogether the same. She never knew motherhood."

Dr. Burt gave the rein a quick tug. "Exactly," he said. His tone was as dry as the drifting dust in the August air. Mrs. Lindsay glanced up at him, slightly taken aback.

"She never had anything," he went on. "That is, nothing that we set our human hearts upon. Maybe Mrs. Powell didn't tell you all. She was on the very verge of Life when the blow fell—a young thing, vivid and joyful, about to marry. Then, wifehood, motherhood, home, active service in the world, it all went out like a blown candle." This time his own voice broke. "No," he finished, after awhile, half absent-mindedly, "she shines from inside, somehow. There's no other way to explain it."

Mrs. Lindsay's fluttering hands were folded now; tears began to fall on her white gloves. "How does she do it?" was her question, after awhile.

"Search me," said the doctor, unashamed of his slang. "I asked the parson once—"

"Mrs. Powell told me," the other interrupted, "that at first Miss Anne rebelled. Her mother remembers—they were great friends. When the doctors broke it to her that there would never be any cure—"

Dr. Burt turned away his face suddenly and gazed off into the fields on the other side. It came to the speaker all at once that he had been the doctor who told Miss Anne. "Then," she added, hurriedly, "after many months there was a change . . . she found a verse, or something, 'a slogan,' Mrs. Powell's mother called it . . . I don't quite remember."

The doctor looked back. "I remember this much," he resumed. "I said to the parson once—not this young fellow here now . . . he frankly says she's still a miracle to him . . . but the old preacher, 'Parson, how does she do it?' I used your very words. He didn't speak for a minute, and then he said, 'Their strength is to sit still.' That was all. I couldn't get anything else out of him. Sounds like the Bible."

They were entering Singleton now, at sunset; the old mare quickened her pace. "Their strength," quoted Mrs. Lindsay, slowly, "is to sit still." She fell silent.

"As I figure it," the doctor went on, diffidently, "there are lots of different kinds of strength and different ways of coming by them." He lapsed into the comparison that came handiest. "Sometimes hurt muscles have to have no end of exercise in order to get well; sometimes they have to stay put, so to speak. Souls may be the same way, for all we know." The woman beside him did not answer. He glanced at her, then pulled the mare up with a sudden jerk. "Back home," he said, "and we clean forgot your wool, and your post-office ruotion, and all the rest of the Clifford stunts!" He peered anxiously into his companion's face.

Mrs. Lindsay smiled. "Never mind," she said, "I—it doesn't matter at all." She was still quiet as he helped her out. The doctor looked at her keenly; her expression puzzled him—her whole attitude. She had a sort of poise that he did not recognize, as she stood at the foot of the hotel steps in the sunset light.

"Thank you, doctor," she said, "for the lift you gave me." He wondered why she smiled so queerly.

"Well, don't go dashing about in the noon sun any more," he warned. "If you need toning up—" His professional instinct stirred, and he fumbled for his pen and pad. "Iron might strengthen you," he said, considering.

Mrs. Lindsay put out a protesting hand. "I don't need iron to strengthen me. There was another prescription; I shall try that. Dr. Burt, I am going to sit still for awhile!"

"Face actually shining," was the man's inward comment. His own face cleared as he turned away and took up the reins. "Better than iron," he said.

Rose of Sharon.

Grace Imogen Gish, Roanoke, Va.

Sweet Rose, that blooms through all the earth,
Be desert wild,
Bloom in my heart and keep it pure
And undefiled.

Fair Rose, I look from earth's wide waste
To heaven and Thee,
Shed Thou Thy fragrance o'er my path Continually.

O, loveliest Rose, earth has no spot
So bleak and drear;
But it seems filled with holier light
If Thou bloom near.

Grant, precious Rose, whate'er I do,
Where'er I be,
I may grow sweeter, truer still—
Like unto Thee.

Favorite Hymns.

IX. Lead Kindly Light.

Rated from a literary standpoint, Lead Kindly Light is probably the most beautiful of the Church's hymns; certainly it is a poem of rare form and finish, full of striking metaphors and lovely cadences, and leading, line by line, to a climax that stirs the very heart of the reader. From a personal standpoint, also, it takes a high place. Not many of us have failed to derive aid from these searching verses; to some, indeed, they stand closely identified with more than one dark hour that turned to light.

John Henry Newman, the author—afterwards Cardinal Newman—was the leader of the Oxford Tractarian Movement in England, in which he strove eagerly to reconcile the strong differences between the Anglican and Roman Catholic churches. At the age of thirty-one, while vicar of St. Mary's, Oxford, he accompanied two friends on a tour of the Mediterranean. It was during this journey, while becalmed in the Straits of St. Bonifacio, that he wrote his great hymn. Returning to England he threw himself eagerly into his mission, writing many tracts and delivering many eloquent sermons. At length, in despair of finding a middle road between Anglicanism and Roman Catholicism, he entered the Roman Church. Not many years before his death he was made cardinal.

Lead Kindly Light, for all its vivid appeal to heart and intellect, does not enjoy universal favor. Many evangelical churches look askance at the poem because, presumably, it was the fruit of Newman's spiritual conflict as he hesitated between the two churches. They contend that to all appearances the Light led him to Rome. Even were it established that the poem was inspired by that struggle, we cannot but feel that this is too free an assumption—too narrow a limitation to put on the inscrutable workings of the Spirit of God. It seems enough to recognize the poem as the cry of a groping heart to its Maker, and to adapt it, as such, to our own souls' needs.

Lead, Kindly Light, amid the encircling gloom,

Lead Thou me on!

The night is dark, and I am far from home,

Lead Thou me on!

Keep Thou my feet! I do not ask to see

The distant scene; one step enough for me.

I was not ever thus, nor prayed that Thou

Shouldst lead me on;

I loved to choose and see my path; but now

Lead Thou me on!

I loved the garish day; and, spite of fears,

Pride ruled my will: remember not past years.

So long Thy power has blest me, sure it still

Will lead me on

O'er moor and fen, o'er crag and torrent till

The night is gone;

And with the morn those angel faces smile

Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile.

The Touch of the Saviour: There is a little crowd of you in church today. If any of you touch the Saviour, will you feel He has touched you? That is the question. There may be some man or woman perhaps sitting next to you who feels the need. You won't know, bless you, it is quite secret. The secret of the Lord is among them that fear Him. Perhaps the one sitting next to you has longed, and longed, and hoped to creep near the Saviour. How do you know? We do not know. It is the mystery of life. But he or she may touch His garment and virtue go out of Him. He is the same yesterday, today and forever.—A. H. Stanton.

"Never Trouble Trouble."

There's a cheery little proverb,
It is very well to heed,
In a world where pain and sorrow
Are quite plentiful indeed.
If you would not have them double,
Then keep this well in view,
To never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Don't think when storm-clouds gather
You are certain to be drowned;
The very darkest tempest
May quickly blow around.
And up above the blackness
Shines evermore the blue;
So never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Of times a gloomy morning
Precedes a sunny day;
So, without word of warning,
Our trials slip away.
What pangs we oft have suffered
From the ills we never knew!
So never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Quit counting all the bridges
You may never have to cross.
Quit climbing all the ridges
Of future pain and loss.
Trudge on and do your duty,
To God and conscience true.
And never trouble trouble
Until trouble troubles you.

Jerry's Bubble Party.

"I'm going to have a party today," announced Jerry on the morning of his sixth birthday.

Uncle Jimmy stared at him in surprise. He and Jerry were alone in the house. Jerry's mother and father had been called away to grandmother, who had been taken ill.

"I guess not," said Uncle Jimmy, at last. "Who is to give the party for you? Not your Uncle Jimmy."

"I'll give it myself," said Jerry. "I've got the pipes from last year, and I'll have another soap bubble party. But it won't be a real party without anything to eat," he ended, wistfully.

Jerry invited his six best friends, and they all came, even though he told them there would be nothing to eat. They blew bubbles until Rosemary blew one as big as a five-cent balloon. Then they laid aside the pipes and went into the woods.

They had been gone only a few moments when they came running back, Jerry leading. "Come quick, Uncle Jimmy," he called. "There's something in the tree that's trying to make soap bubbles, or else it's trying to burst itself."

Uncle Jimmy hurried back with the excited children.

"There it is," whispered Jerry.

"It" was a grayish-brown object about three inches long, with a lumpy body and a pair of beautiful bright eyes. Every other second its breast puffed out until it did look like a soap bubble, in shape at least. And all the while there was a shrill note thrown upon the air.

"Do you hear that noise?" asked Uncle Jimmy. "That is the tree-toad's song, and the soap bubble is his throat expanding when he takes in a breath to sing."

"I didn't know toads sang."

"You're listening to one now, Rosemary," said Uncle Jimmy. "The tree-toad's song is about the first spring note heard in the woods. They beat the birds to it. Now, if I know this fellow, I believe I can give you another treat, though it seems a shame to disturb him. Watch him and tell me if anything happens."

Uncle Jimmy stood on the stump of a tree and gently prodded Mr. Tree Toad with the end of his finger. Instantly he stopped singing, the soap bubble chest became quiet, and after a moment's watchful waiting, he hopped up the branch until he came to a shelter of green leaves. Not a second did the eager eyes of the children leave him.

Suddenly Billy cried out, "He's changed his clothes."

Sure enough, it was wearing a green suit.

"He changed to match his surroundings," explained Uncle Jimmy. "When his brown coat did not hide him on the limb of the tree, he hurried to the leaves and took on their color. He thinks he is hidden now. And he won't sing for a while, either. So let's go back to the house. I believe I smell a birthday cake, and who knows but there might be some roses made out of pink ice cream to eat with it?"

"Oh! Oh!" cried seven voices.

"It's a real party, after all!" shouted Jerry. "And I've had a special singer at my party, just the way mother has at some of hers."—Herald and Presbyter.

Military Terms.

In these martial days you will find it a good thing to keep posted on the meaning of the various military terms that you hear so often and the significance of the insignia that the officers wear. The boy or girl who wishes to be up to date will do well to commit the following list to memory:

A corps is two or more divisions commanded by a major-general.

A division is composed of two or more brigades, also commanded by a major-general.

A brigade, commanded by a brigadier-general, is composed of two or more regiments and independent companies or battalions.

A regiment of infantry consists of twelve line companies and three additional companies. It is commanded by a colonel with the following additional officers: One lieutenant-colonel, three majors, fifteen captains as company commanders, three of them also being members of the colonel's staff as adjutant, quartermaster and commissary; two lieutenants to each company, one lieutenant acting on each of three majors' staff.

A battalion is made up of four companies and is commanded by a major.

A company of infantry is composed of about one hundred and fifty men, divided into two platoons; platoons are divided in squads. A platoon is commanded by a lieutenant; two or more squads are commanded by a sergeant; a squad is commanded by a corporal and comprises seven men besides the corporal.

A company or cavalry is called a troop and a battalion of cavalry is called a squadron.

A company of artillery is called a battery. It is divided into sections and there may be different numbers of guns, according to the kind of artillery.

Three batteries of artillery make a battalion.

Officers of the United States Army are distinguished by the following insignia:

Second-Lieutenant—Brown braid on cuffs, gold-black hat braid, U. S. on collar.

First-Lieutenant—One bar on shoulder, other insignia corresponding to second-lieutenant.

Captain—Two bars on shoulder.

Major—Gold leaf on shoulder.

Lieutenant-Colonel—Silver leaf on the shoulder.

Brigadier-General—One silver star on the shoulder.

Lieutenant-General—Three silver stars on the shoulder.

General—Four silver stars on the shoulder.

All grades wear brown braid on the cuffs, gold-black cord on hats, leather leggings and U. S. on collar.

The insignia worn by different branches of the service are:

Infantry—Two crossed rifles.

Cavalry—Two crossed sabres.

Artillery—Two crossed cannon.

Medical—Mercury wand with entwined snakes.

The designating colors for each branch are: Infantry, blue; cavalry, yellow; artillery, red; medical corps, maroon.

The Rhyming Game.

"Now what can we play next?" Hilda snuggled up to her Great Aunt Agnes as she asked the question that little folks are always asking on rainy days.

"How about a rhyming game?" suggested Aunt Agnes. "We might play one that your Grandmother Hillis and I used to play when we were just about the ages of you and Miriam."

"Oh, that would be lovely! How do you play it?" the children asked.

"Well," Aunt Agnes smiled down at them. "Let me think a minute. It's so long since I've played it. Now I believe I am ready. I have thought of a word that rhymes with gave. And you children must guess what it is."

"Is it brave?" asked Miriam, quickly.

"But that isn't the way you must ask in this game," Aunt Agnes explained.

"You must describe the word, without saying it outright. For instance, you may ask, 'Is it a word that we could use in describing our soldiers?' And I'll answer at once, 'No, it is not brave!'"

"Oh!" said Hilda, thoughtfully. "I believe I understand. Don't you, Miriam?" and Miriam nodded.

Then, "Is it a sort of—sort of deep, dark hollow place in the side of a hill or down in the ground?" asked Miriam. And again Aunt Agnes shook her head.

"No, dear, it isn't cave."

"Is it a dishonest, bad kind of a man?" asked Hilda.

"No, dearie, it isn't knave! You're both playing the game beautifully," she added.

"Is it what our flag does in the wind?" asked Hilda.

"No, it isn't wave," replied Aunt Agnes.

"Oh, my, what can it be?" Miriam and Hilda puckered their foreheads, and for a moment there was silence.

"Is it—is it what we ought to be doing now with food—'specially white bread and wheat and bacon and things they're needing over in Europe?" Miriam asked, eagerly.

"Yes, dear," nodded Aunt Agnes, "you've guessed it this time; it is save. And because you guessed it, it's your turn to think of the next word, Miriam."

"I think this is the nicest game," Hilda said; while Miriam shut her eyes and began to "think hard."

"And it teaches you a lot, too, about words; it's like a language lesson, only it's fun, because it is a game."—The Child's Gem.

A Bear Story.

The man knew there were many bears in California when he built his cabin in the high Sierras. He expected bears to be his neighbors and was sure he should meet them outside his house. He had no idea, however, that the bears would ever walk in and make themselves at home. Yet this is what he saw when he returned one day from a trip over the mountains. He saw a huge bear prowling around outside his cabin.

Instead of walking up and shaking hands with the bear, friendly fashion, or pointing a gun at his head as he might have done, the man stood still and watched from a distance. Suddenly the bear made a startling noise to be sure, but it was nothing compared with the sounds that came from inside the cabin. There were bumps and bangings and squeals, and squeals and banging and bumps.

The man didn't go to the rescue, but stayed where he could think clearly, and where it wouldn't be necessary for him to run. The commotion continued for several minutes before the huge bear emerged, carrying a cloth sack in her arms; this sack she shook and shook and shook, until she tore it open; when out popped a little brown bear and a rat.

At last the man understood—the little brown bear had entered his cabin with its mother's consent, and sniffed around until he found the sugar sack; into that sugar sack he stuck his inquisitive young nose, and where his nose went his body followed. The rat was inside the sugar sack; before the wee bear had eaten all the sugar he wanted the rat bit his nose. Of course, the little bear squealed, and the huge bear, waiting outside, knowing that evil had befallen her child, immediately sprang to his defense without asking the man of the house please to come and open the door.

It was a misunderstanding all around. The small bear couldn't be blamed for liking sugar; the old bear loved her child; doubtless the rat meant no harm; his great desire must have been to get out of the sack; and when the old bear took a hand in the performance, the rat didn't care whose nose he bit, so he bit two noses instead of one.

Perhaps the old bear felt that the cabin was too crowded for the proper shaking of the sack. Anyway, she gave the man a chance to see what caused the trouble when she carried that sack outdoors and gave the rat to understand that she was equal to the occasion.

The man laughed when he saw what happened next; the huge bear and the little bear licked the sugar off each other's faces before they trotted off into the big woods. As for the man of the cabin, it took him the rest of the day to clean house and repair the door.

Maybe the reason he wasn't a bit cross about what those troublesome bears did was because he knew he could tell a true story about a bear that would make children laugh.—Frances M. Fox, in Queen's Gardens.

For the Southern Churchman. Doing Her Bit.

Rebecca Robbins Kerr, Aged 10, Ashland, Va.

She planted the rows of the corn with care,

Said she, "I will put the cucumbers there."

So she dug up the ground and she raked and she hoed,

And then she got ready to reap what she sowed.

So she worked away from morning till night,

Picking off potato-bugs and spraying for blight.

After each rain the weeds grew up high; She said, "I will pull you up by and by."

So the little maid worked in her plot day by day,

And never did she with another lass play;

But willingly did all her chores at the home,

And sat by the window, not caring to roam.

While the others played or went on long tramps

She was down town buying some good Thrift Stamps.

Hanging in her window, where her grandma sat knitting,

Was a service flag for their boy who was fitting

Across the sea to sunny France To help to make the Kaiser dance.

So when the war is o'er, my dears, This little maid will have no fears!

The Clock's Two Hands.

"Come, hurry up!" said the second-hand of a clock to the minute-hand. "You'll never get around in time if you don't. See how fast I'm going," continued the fussy little monitor, as it fretted around on its pivot.

"Come, hurry up!" said the minute-hand to the hour-hand, utterly oblivious of being addressed by the second-hand. "If you don't be quick, you'll never be in at the stroke of one."

"Well, that's just what our young friend there has been saying to you."

At this point the clock pealed forth the hour as the hour-hand continued:

"You see, we're in time—not one of us behind. You take my advice—do your own work in your own way."

Christ and Toil.

Our Saviour was a laboring man. He was born of poor parents. He knew what it meant to help support the family. He was a carpenter and the son of a carpenter. His hands became blistered from toil. He wiped the perspiration from His brow. He retired at night weary in body from the day's labor. He belonged to the laboring class. And when He desired to select twelve men to be with Him, He chose those who had a trade and plied it. When they began following Him they left the nets, the receipt of custom, and whatever else may have engaged them. He never spoke of the idler but to rebuke him. He gave the impression that there was no room in His world for the person with nothing to do. He Himself was a busy man, and He wanted to see everyone else doing something. He spoke much by parable, and many of His parables had to do with those who toiled. He spoke of the woman hiding leaven in meal, of the shepherd caring for his sheep, of the sower going forth to sow, of laborers working in the vineyard. Abraham Lincoln said, "The Lord must have loved the common people, for He made so many of them." He might have gone a step further and said, "The Lord must have loved the common people, for He became one of them."—Young Folks.

Riddle.

Riddlemaree, long and blue,
It creeps and it runs the country through.

It has a mouth but it has no feet,
It has a bed but it has no sheet;
It has a bank but it keeps no gold,
It's ever new and it's ever old;
It's full of eyes, yet it cannot see—
Who can guess my riddlemaree?

Answer to last week's riddle: A tear.

The Fairy Cap.

Once, long, long days ago, there was a naughty little fairy who was playing truant down by the riverside. This fairy wore a little cap, and on the cap was a bright gold feather that shined and sparkled when the sunlight fell upon it.

This was such a wild free day for the truant fairy. He laughed, and sang, and whistled, and ran through the fields just as happy as a fairy could possibly be. He chased the butterflies, blue butterflies and golden, red and orange, some with spots on their wings and some with stripes, jeweled butterflies, and butterflies that looked like filmy lace. When he caught one that he wished to keep, he bound it up with ropes made of cobwebs so that it could not move nor fly away again.

While he was laughing and singing, and running and playing, he lost his little cap with the golden feather on it. But he was so happy and gay that he did not care, thinking he could find it again when the sun was going down and it was time for him to go home. By and by when the sun did go down, and it became so dusky that he could run and play no longer, he thought he would find his little cap. But search as he might, he could not find it, and the tears came into his wee bright eyes. He puzzled for a long time as to just what he should do, and then a very happy thought came to him. He had lost his cap with the golden feather, but he would take in place of it a golden dandelion. This he did with all speed, and placed it upon his head and there it stayed. Now he runs around through all the fields among all the dandelions, but we cannot tell which one he is.—Ex.

The Useful Peanut.

The peanut is a sturdy friend in time of need. Now when the food administration is asking that fats be saved, the peanut comes to the rescue in more than one combination. There is peanut butter, for instance. It should be more widely used. The only reason that it isn't is because people do not know how best to use it. Even peanut butter sandwiches are seldom well made.

The "butter" for them should never be spread as it comes from the jar. Put it in a cup or bowl and combine it with twice as much thin cream, milk or water. Stir until thoroughly creamy and of the consistency of mayonnaise, then vary the flavor by adding a little shaved cheese, chopped pickles or olives, hot catsup, orange marmalade, chopped dates and lemon juice, salad dressing, or onion juice, with a little bit of salt as required.

Besides its use in sandwiches, however, there are countless other delicious ways of using peanut butter, as in

RHEUMATISM AND INDIGESTION.

Practically all physicians and medical writers are agreed that there is a close relationship between indigestion and Rheumatism. This view is substantiated by the fact that Shivar Spring Water, which is probably the best American mineral water for Dyspepsia and Indigestion, relieves Rheumatism and the Rheumatoid diseases such as Gout, Sciatica, Neuralgia and Nervous Headache. All of these diseases are probably related and all are probably due in whole or in part to imperfect digestion or to imperfect assimilation of food. Physicians who have studied this water and who have observed its effects in their practice believe that it relieves these maladies by rendering the digestion complete and perfect and thereby preventing the formation of those poisons which inflame the joints and irritate the nerves, and also by eliminating, through the kidneys, such poisons as have already been formed.

The following letters are interesting in this connection. Dr. Crosby, a South Carolina physician, writes:—"I have tested your Spring Water in several cases of Rheumatism, Chronic Indigestion, Kidney and Bladder troubles and in Nervous and Sick Headaches and find that it has acted nicely in each case, and I believe that if used continuously for a reasonable time, will produce a permanent cure. It will purify the blood, relieve debility, stimulate the action of the Liver, Kidneys and Bladder, aiding them in throwing off all poisonous matter."

Dr. Avant of Savannah writes:—"I suffered for years with a most aggravating form of stomach disorder and consulted a number of our best local physicians, went to Baltimore and consulted specialists there and still I was not benefited. I had about despaired of living when I began to use Shivar Spring Water and in a short time was cured."

Mr. Rhodes of Virginia writes:—"Please send me ten gallons of Shivar Spring Water quickly. I want it for Rheumatism. I know of several who were cured of Rheumatism with this water."

Editor Cunningham writes:—"The water has done more good than any medicine I have ever taken for Rheumatism. Am entirely free from pain."

Mr. McClam of South Carolina writes:—"My wife has been a sufferer from Rheumatism and after drinking twenty gallons of your Mineral Water, was entirely cured of the horrible disease."

Mr. Carter of Virginia writes:—"Mrs. Carter has had enlarged joints upon her hands, caused by Rheumatism. Shivar Spring Water removed every trace of the enlargement. The water is simply excellent."

If you suffer with Rheumatism, or with any chronic disease, accept the guarantee offer below by signing your name. Clip and mail to the soups, breads and cakes. It serves both as shortening and thickening and adds richness, color and flavor. No food, of course, can be judged by its fuel value alone, but it is interesting to note that from the point of fuel value, peanut butter is worth three times its weight in round steak, four times its weight in eggs, seven times its weight in potatoes and twice its weight in bread.—Good Housekeeping.

When Tied Down.

We are never free to do our best unless we are tied down. Limitations are not necessarily the things that prevent us from doing all that we might. Until we are working under conscious limitations we are great wasters of time and effort, and we are simply running about like truants who are deaf to the school bell. The poet whose verse seems to have the freest flow of music is the poet who holds himself to the challenging limitations of his art, and produces his work under that pressure. The woman whose work in her home counts for most is not the woman who is as free as a child from binding duties, but who is tied down by the very nobility of her task to specific things that she must do. And the Christian who would know the freedom of the life that is Christ's must first learn the blessed bondage of surrender to Christ, in which he discovers the limitations that alone lead to freedom in doing God's will. Only those who are "tied down" in Christ are truly free.—Sunday School Times.

What Is Nuxated Iron?

Physician Explains—Says Public Ought to Know What They Are Taking—Practical Advice on What To Do To Build Up Your Strength, Power and Endurance and Increase the Red Blood Corpuscles.

The fact that Nuxated Iron is today being used by over three million people annually and that so many physicians are prescribing it as a tonic, strength and blood builder in weak, nervous, run-down conditions has led to an investigation of its merits by designated physicians and others whose reports should be of great importance to the public generally. Among these is the statement made by Dr. James Francis Sullivan, formerly physician of Bellevue Hospital (Outdoor Dept.), New York, and Westchester County Hospital, who says: "When one patient after another began asking my opinion of Nuxated Iron, I resolved to go thoroughly into the subject and find out for myself whether or not it possessed the real value claimed by its manufacturers and attested to by so many prominent people. This is exactly what I believe every honest, conscientious physician should do before prescribing or lending his endorsement to any product whatsoever. If an article is worthless we practitioners ought to be the first to know of it and if it is efficacious we are in duty bound to recommend it for the welfare of our patients. A study of the composition of the Nuxated Iron formula so impressed me with the therapeutic efficacy of the product that I immediately tested it in a number of obstinate cases. So quickly did it increase the strength, energy and endurance of the patients to whom it was administered that I became firmly convinced of its remarkable value as a tonic and blood builder. I have since taken it myself with excellent results. There are thousands of delicate, nervous, run-down folks who need just such a preparation as this but do not know what to take. Therefore I have urgently suggested the widespread publication of the sworn statement of the composition of its formula so that the public may know what they are taking. This complete formula is now to be found in newspapers throughout the country. It is composed principally of organic iron in the form of iron peptonate of a special specific standard and glycerophosphates which is one of the most costly tonic ingredients known. To the credit of the manufacturers it may be said that they use the most expensive form of iron peptonate, whereas by employing other makes they could have put the same quantity of actual iron in the tablets at less than one-fourth the cost and by using metallic iron they could have reduced the cost to less than one-twelfth, but by thus cheapening the product they would undoubtedly have impaired its therapeutic efficacy. In my opinion a careful examination of this formula by any physician or pharmacist should convince him that Nuxated Iron is to be placed among the very highest class and most strictly ethical preparations known to medical science. It excels anything I have ever used for building up the system and increasing the red blood corpuscles thereby enriching and fortifying the blood against the ravages of disease."

Funsten-Gildey: On Saturday at 5 o'clock in the afternoon, April 27, 1918, in St. John's Episcopal Church, Washington, D. C., by the Rt. Rev. James Bowen Funsten, Bishop of Idaho, WILLIAM PRATT FUNSTEN to MARGARET LOUISE GILDEY.

Fry: Born, November 2, 1868, in Mobile, Ala., died May 27, 1918, in New York City, CHARLES PHILIP FRY, beloved son of the late Thomas Slaughter Fry, of Mobile, Ala., and his wife, Mary Shorter Fry. Married Marjorie Benedict, of

New York City. A devoted husband, a loving son and brother and a loyal true friend, combining the finest qualities of heart and mind. To those who mourn his loss are left the blessed memories of his sweet, unselfish nature, his high sense of honor and firm judgment, and above all his beautiful Christian life.

"Some lives live on:
Hearts which death could not still speak on."

CAPTAIN FRANK LEE.

CAPTAIN FRANK T. LEE died July 12th, of pneumonia at the Home and Retreat. He was born in Lynchburg seventy-two years ago, and was the son of John B. Lee and Lella Tompkins Lee. He was educated at V. M. I. and was one of the cadets taking part in the battle of New Market.

After the war he engaged in the tobacco business until 1890, when he became interested in developing coal properties in West Virginia and was president at the time of his death of the Guyandotte and the Sovereign Coal Companies.

As a young man he organized the Lynchburg Light Artillery and was captain of the company for many years. In 1867 he married Miss Lucy Harrison Norvell and on April 23, 1917, they celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of their marriage.

Captain Lee is survived by his wife and L. Norvell Lee, Frank M. Lee, Mrs. A. H. Jennings and J. B. Lee.

He had been a member of St. Paul's Episcopal Church from his early life, having served the parish a number of years as a member of the vestry.

The record of facts above does not attempt to sum up the personal character of Captain Lee. Such a true type of the old Virginia gentleman can scarcely be described, yet it is a type so rapidly disappearing that we would guard more jealously the pattern for the sake of the generations which are to come after.

We see first a Christian soul, strong, clear, just, inflexible in his convictions of duty; added to that, a courtesy and chivalry of manner only to be found in the man nurtured in that older civilization in which he grew up. Those who met him in the business world knew his integrity, his uncompromising sense of right; his co-workers in the church felt his consecration and high idealism; but it is for those who touched more intimately the man within—the man in the home circle—to testify that his strength, dignity and generosity were crowned by a serene peace under the severest tests, which made his path a shining one for himself and a light of inspiration to those who were privileged to walk by his side. To such as he death was not the "Valley of the Shadow," rather the heights before the Gate Beautiful which leads to the Holy City of our God where there is no need of a candle, neither light of the sun.

To those who mourn him is extended our sympathy as well as our congratulations upon the possession of so priceless a heritage as the example of his life.

Appeals to the individual by an individual is the hopeful way of winning the race to Christ.

Bossuet, the great French preacher, said frankly as to this very matter: "It requires more faith and courage to say two words face to face with one single sinner, than from the pulpit to rebuke two or three thousand persons, ready to listen to everything, on condition of forgetting all."—Dr. H. C. Trumbell.

Ruins.

By Charles Hanson Towne.

They sat at supper in a shadowy room,
 "But you," she said, "you are an artist!
 You

Deplore this tearing down of all our dreams!

You know that War is shattering the world,

And Beauty falls in ashes at our feet."
 He looked at her, full-blown and glorious

 With flaming eyes and tossed, abundant hair.

"How I abhor this hour!" he softly said.

"I never thought the world could come to this.

Yet always through the years, the flame of War,

Like a long crimson serpent, has crept and crept,

And poisoned all the beauty that we built.

The Parthenon was stricken by the blast

Of cruel cannon in disastrous days;
 Yet in the moonlight it is wonderful

In a strange way the mind can never name.

And strong barbarian hordes tore down that dream.

The Colosseum; and many Romans wept.

Yet it is lovelier on soft Summer nights Than ever it must have been in the young years.

 And Rheims—it shall be doubly beautiful

 With a new meaning through the centuries,

 Hushed with its memories of this dark hour."

Her face grew grave. "You dare to tell me this!—

You say a ruin is more wonderful
 Than the pure dream the architect once dreamed?"

"I cannot answer. But one thing I know;

Men rush across the seas to catch one glimpse

Of fallen fanes and tottering columns
 Yes,

They fare through desolate places that their eyes

May rest at last on crumbling marble
 . . . See!

Those men and women rise—and we must rise

To pay our tribute to that noble man
 Who has come back, a ruin from the War."

She turned. There was a soldier at the door;

And one sleeve of his uniform hung limp,

And there were many scars upon his cheeks.

"A ruin!" the artist whispered. "Yet he seems

The only whole and perfect man I know!"

Again—First Things.

Not a little criticism has been brought against the Church because of her failure—as is charged—to be a leader of public thought and activity in these strenuous days of the war. We do not here discuss the merits of such criticism, much of which we know to be unfair, but may it not be that if the Church is remiss or weak in any of these particulars, she has become so through a long succession of generations of Christian men and women who have failed generally—in the common things of life in the Church—in putting first things first.

No individual or institution can retain the confidence of a loyal following, while at the same time seeking to ease the burden of responsibility, or to lower the level of the ideal. A man in the trench today shrinks from the thought of "going over the top," but he goes, and promptly, nevertheless. He would despise a military leader who would seek to excuse him from the duty.

What men want today is a high ideal held continually before them, not only in their military and national life, but in the spiritual and religious life. Men are hungering and thirsting after righteousness in these days a good bit more than we think they are, and sometimes they are surprised that we seem not to know it. Some of them are turning to one thing after another, and not to the Church. These are finding no spiritual satisfaction in their quest. May it not be that we of the Church are at fault because with us the Church's real mission has not become a passion?—St. Andrew's Cross.

Tact is not merely shown in saying the right thing at the right time, and to the right people. It is shown quite as much in the many things left unsaid and apparently unnoticed.—Lecky.

Thoughts For the Thoughtful

An error gracefully acknowledged is a victory won.

The woof of life is dark, but it is shot with a warp of gold.

The high-bred fear of giving offense is of all fears the noblest.

A propensity to hope and joy is real riches, one to fear and sorrow real poverty.

The wonder is always and always how there can be a mean man or an infidel.—Walt Whitman.

The very impossibility in which I find myself to prove that God is not, discloses to me His existence.

No human being can come into this world without increasing or diminishing the sum total of human happiness.

Our anger and impatience often prove more mischievous than the things about which we are angry and impatient.

The truest help we can render to an afflicted man is not to take his burden from him, but to call out his best strength that he may be able to bear the burden.—Phillip Brooks.

When you get into a tight place, and everything goes against you, till it seems as if you couldn't hold on a minute longer, never give up then, for that is just the place and time the tide will turn.

"A commonplace life," we say, and we sigh;

But why should we sigh as we say? The commonplace sun in the commonplace sky

Makes up the commonplace day.

The moon and the stars are commonplace things,

And the flower that blooms and the bird that sings,

But dark were the world and sad were our lot;

If the flowers had failed and the sun shone not;
And God, who studies each commonplace soul,
Out of commonplace things makes His beautiful whole.

—Susan Coolidge.

The essence of lying is in deception, not in words; a lie may be told by silence, by equivocation, by the accent on a syllable, by a glance of the eye attaching a peculiar significance to a sentence; and all these kinds of lies are worse and baser by many degrees than a lie plainly worded; so that no form of blinded conscience is so far sunk as that which comforts itself for having deceived because the deception was by gesture or silence, instead of utterance.—John Ruskin.

The camel at the close of day
Kneels down upon the sandy plain,
To have his burden lifted off
And rest again.

My soul, thou, too, shouldst to thy knees,

When daylight draweth to a close,
And let thy Master lift the load
And grant repose.

Else how couldst thou tomorrow meet,
With all tomorrow's work to do,
If thou thy burden all the night
Dost carry through?

The camel kneels at break of day
To have the guide replace his load,
Then rises up anew to take
The desert road.

So thou shouldst kneel at morning's dawn,

That God may give thee daily care,
Assured that He no load too great
Will make thee bear.

BISHOP HALL ON PROHIBITION.

In his address at the Annual Diocesan Convention of Vermont, the Rt. Rev. A. C. A. Hall, Bishop of Vermont, spoke in part as follows:

"(1) We need for varied service the men who would be released from employments in all sorts of ways in connection with liquor, its manufacture, distribution, sale.

"(2) We need the buildings for the storage of food that are now used for the manufacture and storage of liquor.

"(3) We need the foodstuff that is now put into drink. It is said by men of authority that grain and other ingredients are now diverted to alcohol sufficient to feed thousands if not millions of men.

"(4) We need all our men, and especially our soldiers and sailors, and our women, at their best, without any lessened efficiency due directly or indirectly to the use of alcohol.

"(5) We must have our camps and training grounds, with their neighboring cities and villages, so far as possible clean and free from temptations to young men removed from the restraints of home and ordinary life.

"(6) We will not put on those in the direct service of their country a restriction that we do not accept for ourselves.

"(7) If prohibition, Statewide or nationwide, succeeds as a war measure, we shall be free with added experience to consider the advisability of its continuance. But for the time of the war let it be without hesitation adopted, and without fear or favor enforced."

Twelve Things to Remember.

The value of time.
The success of perseverance.
The pleasure of working.
The dignity of simplicity.
The worth of a character.
The power of a kindness.
The influence of example.
The obligation of duty.
The wisdom of economy.
The virtue of patience.
The improvement of talent.
The joy of originating.—Marshall Field.

Life, possible—and to choose death! freedom—and to choose serfdom! blessedness—and to choose misery! No insanity so foolish as the insanity of the wicked. No folly so insane as the folly of those who despise their God.—A. R. Wells.

Each time we love,
We turn a nearer and a broader mark,
To that keen archer, sorrow, and he strikes.

"What's He Talking About?"

This is an experience which every American who goes to France will have—he will find his French comrades trying to talk with him, asking him questions, and offering him useful and interesting information. What an inconvenience and embarrassment it will be to be unable to understand or reply! No American need be unable. Here's a pocket manual that will give instantly the French (with its pronunciation) of almost anything the soldier or sailor will want to say.

The Soldier's Service Dictionary

prepared by F. H. VIZETELLY, Litt. D., LL. D., for Americans who do not know French and need to get a speaking knowledge of it in a hurry. Ten thousand military and conversational terms are given in one alphabetical order, and under each word are given the correct forms in many different phrases. The commands, technical terms, popular phrases, etc., of every branch of the service are explained and pronounced, as are also thousands of conversational terms needed in every-day life. Many commanding officers of the U. S. A. have endorsed this manual, including Maj.-Gen. J. T. Dickman, Col. J. A. Ryan, Maj.-Gen. H. T. Allen, Lieut.-Col. A. C. Read, etc. If YOU are going to France, you need this manual. If a friend of yours is going, get one for him.

THE "RELIGION OF THE TRENCHES."

This article under the above title, an editorial from the Lexington, Kentucky, Leader, is sent us by a clerical friend with the commendation of himself and two other clergymen who were guests in his home, as a sensible statement on an interesting subject. We are glad to pass it on to our readers:

The world is hearing a great deal these days about "the religion of the trenches."

The young men of all nations now at war, we are told, when they return to their homes, will take back with them something entirely new in theology, a conception of the Deity and of man's relation to the Creator different from anything hitherto impressed upon the human intellect.

This has a refreshing sound and is pleasing to the ears of men and women everywhere who are struggling with their own spiritual problems and at the same time trying to harmonize the theories and practices of others with their own feeble conceptions of religion.

Some of us are old-fashioned enough to doubt that the men in the trenches will discover in the horrors of war and bring back with them anything that is essentially new, although they may return to the work-a-day world possessed of deeper and finer religious convictions than they entertained before they went forth to kill and destroy.

There are some of us who believe that these boys, instead of discovering something new in theology will find something that is very old indeed—the plain and simple gospel and religion of the Christ. And if, perchance, they come to the realization that there is no middle ground in this theology, that a man must live either within or without it, the war may have been worth while, after all.

The man in the trenches will get this new impulse from one of three sources. It will come to him as a consequence of being face to face with death; as a result of mingling man to man with his fellows on a plane where wealth and social standing and ancestry melt away in the presence of genuine manhood and spiritual power; or through his contact with the materialism of Prussian philosophy, out of which have come the horrible practices of the warfare of the Hun of the twentieth century.

Opposed to the selfishness and the brutality of the Hun, the man in the trenches will set up the altruism and the charity of the Christ, and against the beastiality of the German soldiery he will invoke that beatific pronouncement, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God."

The prediction that the man in the trenches will bring back with him a new, a more robust, a more positive theology, is based no doubt upon the feverish search for a remedy for present day spiritual ills. The tendency of humanity has been away from the landmarks of Christianity. They are too exacting, they interfere too much with the freedom of that degree of inherent depravity which is supposed to lurk in the frame of mankind generally.

A large part of the world is seeking a religion that will soothe and satisfy the conscience without disarranging the plans of the flesh. There is nothing new or strange about this. It has been the way of earth from the beginning, but the human soul has never entirely lost its hold on the eternal truths of this life and the life to come and it never will. The destiny of the race is fixed. It is upward and onward.

Germany forgot God, or rather her rulers erected a spurious Deity for their blind followers to worship, and behind whom they have concealed their brutish and selfish designs and purposes, and German materialism has brought down upon it the fury of mankind. Its death knell is sounded.

The religion of the trenches will not be new. It is as old as Calvary. It dates back to the Cross. If mankind is saved, it must be by that sign. The man or the nation that forgets God and closes the eye to the Crucified Christ can have no peace.

That must be the religion of the trenches and of the universe. Every man's conscience tells him what it means. He can neither deceive himself nor anybody else about its obligations.

Unquestionably the writer of the above has the right view of the matter. The gospel of our Lord Jesus in its entirety is neither going to be superseded nor improved upon by anything that the war will produce. And that despite a great deal that has been written and preached on the subject by imitators of Donald Hankey who have neither found his viewpoint nor understood his message.

This is not saying, however, that the gospel of God is not going to be better known and its meaning and content more fully apprehended. Patriotism a high courage, the consecration of one's service and the willingness to sacrifice one's life in a just and holy cause are not going to become cheap passports to Heaven, but to multitudes of brave souls, we trust, they are going to be stepping-stones to the realization and reception of the truth that shall make them free. These are not necessarily religious or spiritual qualifications, yet he who has consciously and determinately schooled his mind and will to such attainment is by so much nearer the Kingdom of God. Unless pride or a false philosophy of self-sufficiency or of fatalism shall intervene, the Spirit of Truth should find a readier access to that soul. No new God with a new code of righteousness is going to be discovered on the battle-torn fields of France, but the God of whom the Cross of Calvary is the supreme revelation is going to be better known and acknowledged as men and women mount their Calvaries and find Him there. The Cross will have a new significance in the civilization of the future and no less in the souls of men who in their own experience have caught from afar new glimpses of its meaning. The one central truth of Christianity is receiving an exemplification in these days which will stamp it, let us humbly trust, upon the consciousness of the world as never before. "He that saveth his life shall lose it"—our scorn of the slacker is teaching us that; "and he that loseth his life for My sake shall find it"—the new-born manhood in many a soul is proving the hard paradox to be the simplest truth.

That men will return from the war with a greater impatience than before with much that has been taught them in the name of religion is no doubt true. The narrowness of some theological views, conventionalities that have hardened into supposed obligations, a dilettantism in pious observances which fails to produce character, will find little place in their scheme. And, therein danger lies lest they throw overboard somewhat also that is true and valuable. The Church should be prepared with a presentation of religion that is true and strong and simple for these men, and she will find herself the better and stronger in so doing. Recognizing the educational value of their experiences, the realities they shall have faced, the needs they shall have discovered, the outlook upon life and its essentials they shall have gained, she must be ready to meet them with a message stripped of subtleties and superfluities but whole in its verities and constraining in its demands. It will not be an easy or perfunctory religion that will attract them but one that is genuine and convincing, strong in its appeal, high in its requirements, practical in its ends. The gospel of Christ in its wholeness and simplicity has just that to offer. "The things that cannot be shaken" will remain in their splendor and power and will satisfy the needs and aspirations of every true soul.

Answers to Prayer.

I asked for grace to lift me high,
Above the world's depressive cares;
God sent me sorrows; with a sigh
I said, He has not heard my prayers.

I asked for light, that I might see
My path along life's thorny road;
But clouds and darkness shadowed me
When I expected light from God.

I asked for peace, that I might rest
To think my sacred duties o'er,
When lo! such horrors filled my breast
As I had never felt before.

And Oh, I cried, can this be prayer Whose plaints the steadfast mountains move?
Can this be heaven's prevailing care—
And, O my God, is this Thy love?

But soon I found that sorrow, worn
As Duty's garment, strength supplies,
And out of darkness meekly borne
Unto the righteous light doth rise.

And soon I found that fears which stirr'd
My startled soul God's will to do,
On me more real peace conferr'd
Than in life's calm I ever knew.

Then, Lord, in Thy mysterious ways
Lead my dependent spirit on,
And whoso'er it kneels and prays,
Teach it to say, "Thy will be done!"

Let its one thought, one hope, one prayer
Thine image seek—Thy glory see;
Let every other wish and care
Be left confidingly to Thee!

—J. S. B. Monsell.

The Prophet Jeremiah speaks of two evils that the people of Israel had committed. They had forsaken God, "the Fountain of living waters," and they had "hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns, that can hold no water." The grace of God is a fountain, abundant, free, sparkling, the very thing needed to satisfy the thirst of the soul, and every one is welcome to take it and possess it. But here are people who, instead of availing themselves, construct cisterns of their own, at immense expenditure of trouble and toil. And then, after all the pains they have taken, the cistern is of no use. There is no water in it. It cannot quench the thirst.

That is a very common mistake still. Any one who forsakes God and devotes himself to the world, its business or its pleasures, expecting to find there what will satisfy his soul, is sure to be woefully disappointed. The world does not keep its promise. It is a well without water. The pleasure that it gives passes away. It has a sting in it. It leaves behind it a bitter taste. It is poisonous. It brings death. Only in God is there real satisfaction for the soul, real peace, real joy.—Ex.

EDUCATION IN COLLEGES.

Mr. Editor: The letter of the Rev. W. M. Walton in your issue of July 6th on the subject of education in colleges ought to stir the whole Church to remedy the condition so clearly set forth. If he were the only witness to such things we might all dismiss the subject as the words of an "alarmist," but such is not the case. Some of our most noted bishops have sounded a similar warning and many others in the humbler walks of life. What he has to say is absolutely borne out by my experience in the Galilee Mission and by observations in the Church to-day.

I suppose the blindest devotee of scholarship is now awakened to the folly of our sending our young men to Germany for the benefit of their superior (?) educational advantages, and to get the finishing touches given to their inferior instruction in this country, and to give our professors the very newest ideas in the destructive methods of the higher critics, who have been doing their utmost to rid the Bible of its supernatural character and power, and to explain the miracles on a purely natural basis. These men have come back to our colleges and seminaries overflowing with these ideas and lose no opportunity to instill them into the lives and hearts of the young men and women committed to their care, with the result that when they come home they have lost much of the reverence for God's Holy Word and not infrequently laugh at its miracles. Europe is reaping the harvest of such teaching now, while the world stands by and beholds the spectacle of a de-vitalized Christianity shorn of most of its true power to vitalize and uplift a rotten culture and civilization that seems to be falling to pieces by its own dead weight! One of the most prominent pastors in Berlin has even given up the historic Christ and says that He is like our Santa Claus, merely an idea that has been found helpful. Since coming to Galilee Mission ten years ago I have dealt with more than fifty clergymen of all kinds or communions, who have lost their faith and fallen into the depths of sin, and the theological students have been too numerous to keep the count—all fell practically the same story—viz: "I went to college, where I got my faith in the Bible punctured, then to the seminary and got it finished. I wish I could believe as you do, but I cannot." Few clergymen have heard more of this than I have. It is dreadful! They often begin in this way: "You do not believe the stories in the Old Testament, do you? You must know that the very best scholarship has abandoned them entirely. I once believed all of them, but not now." Then when I talk with students from many sections of the country and hear them tell me that they are getting a great deal of the same thing in colleges and seminaries, I am filled with anxiety and alarm. I wish I were at liberty to give a number of concrete cases where young men have gone away from home to seminaries and had their faith almost wrecked and their Christianity devitalized. One of the most successful Baptist ministers in this country said some time ago in a public address that he did not know any seminary in his Church where he was willing to trust a young man to be instructed and feel that he would come out with more faith than he went in with! Some of these teachers tear heaven out with the learned remark: "We now know that heaven is a condition, not a place." They go through hell and put out the fire with their automatic fire extinguisher, then through the grave and deny the resurrection and even box the devil up and ship him off to—I do not know where, for I have not noticed his works have greatly diminished! This may be one reason why John Wesley would not allow his preachers to go to the seminaries, but taught them in training schools where faith and belief were packed in, instead of being taken out! Spurgeon did the same thing in his famous pastors' college or training school. Some one has said that Daniel is having a much harder time in the critics' den than he did in the lions' den. I heard a noted preacher in St. Margaret's, London, say "that when some professors in our seminaries went to their summer homes at the end of the session they could well be said to be 'returning from the slaughter of the kings—possibly Chronicles and the Pentateuch'!" I did not try to dispute with him or interrupt him in his remarks. Dr. Griffith Thomas told me here in Philadelphia that Wycliffe College, Toronto, does not take a student on the recommendation of a bishop or clergyman, but only after searching examination to see if they are truly converted and sound in the faith and have an experimental knowledge of Christ, and added that thirty were turned away in one year. I wish this test might be applied, not only to students entering the seminaries, but to the teachers as well. The Church is suffering more for endowment than for endowment! When the emphasis is placed more upon the question, "Have ye received the Holy Ghost?" than upon the question, "Have ye passed your canonicals?" a brighter day will dawn for the Church, and it is not impossible to believe that we may have more Apostolic Bishops who will seek out men for Holy Orders like Stephen—"full of faith and the Holy Ghost." I am devoutly thankful that our Blessed Lord said to Peter at that wonderful meeting by the sea, "Simon, son of Jonas, do you love Me?" instead of "Simon, have you passed all your canonicals?" No doubt poor Simon expected some "godly discipline," but instead got the sweetest question Jesus ever asked and also a renewal of that close fellowship that made him what he proved to be—a giant for God!

J. J. D. HALL.

Galilee Mission, Philadelphia.

"The business of the Sunday school is not the imparting of facts, even though they be Biblical facts, but the leading of lives. Success demands an understanding of the life, the nature and the needs of the pupil (psychology), of the principles of teaching (pedagogy), of the principles of the organization and management of the modern Sunday school, and of God's Word; but the Bible is the means to an end, and not the end in itself—the end is fulness of life in Christ Jesus."

THE WORK OF THE CHURCH AT THE FRONT.

By the Rt. Rev. John N. McCormick, D. D., Bishop of Western Michigan.

Returning from France after having represented the War Commission there since last October, I beg to thank the Church papers and the Church people for a cordial welcome home.

I am glad to report that our Church work is now well established overseas. Bishop Perry, of Rhode Island, has gone over to take my place. At the expiration of six months or thereabouts I shall hope to relieve him, and thereafter it will be turn about so that there will always be one of us abroad who has had the chance to become familiar with the situation. Mr. H. C. Ross, who, in spite of newspaper descriptions to the contrary, is not a clergyman, but a Boston layman, remains as Secretary, and the office of the Commission continues to be in the Guild House of Holy Trinity Church, 23 Avenue de l'Alma, Paris. Bishop Perry's mailing address will be the same as mine, in care of Morgan, Harjes & Co., 31 Boulevard Haussmann, Paris.

As reported from time to time through the Church papers, the Paris office is card-cataloguing all our men as far as and as fast as their names can be obtained, and every man on arrival in France receives a letter notifying him of the representation of his own Church through its Commission, and of the desire of the Commission to help him in every possible way. We are in close touch with all our chaplains and with many hundreds of our men, and this touch should become more and more directly beneficial as the war goes on. I urge our Church people to send the names of all our men as they go over and to use the Paris office freely and fully for information and for communication. Its usefulness has been demonstrated and its establishment has been a hundred-fold justified. Our Church was the first to be represented by a Bishop or an authorized official, and our initiative in this regard has made a marked impression. As is generally known, Bishop Lawrence continues to be Chairman of the War Commission and Bishop Perry's place as Chairman of the Executive Committee has been taken by Bishop Reese, and the Rev. Dr. Washburn is installed as Secretary. All communications addressed to the Church Commission, 14 Wall Street, New York, will receive immediate attention. While I am in this country I shall be most happy to answer any questions and to supply any information. I have already had some sixty or seventy requests for sermons, addresses, etc., and I hope to comply with as many of these requests as time and space will permit.

I have been asked to say something, as the result of experience and observation, in regard to the Clergy who wish to volunteer for overseas work, and since my return I have received many letters on this subject. Outside direct military service, there are only three ways in which a clergyman of our Church can go—namely, with the American Red Cross, with the Y. M. C. A. or as a Chaplain in the Army. The Y. M. C. A. is calling for a large increase of men, and quite a number of our clergy are serving with it. They may go as secretaries or as special speakers on the various Y. M. C. A. circuits. With the Red Cross several of our clergy have gone as workers among civilians and refugees or as searchers in hospitals. Some of them on arrival in France have been transferred to the Chaplains' Bureau and are now serving as Hospital Chaplains. The Red Cross Bureau of Hospital Chaplains, of which I was the chief and in which Bishop Perry succeeds me, comprises the chaplains of base hospitals, evacuation hospitals, mobile units and Red Cross emergency hospitals. Many of our clergy are in this service, and at the present time it would not seem wise to send others, as we already have considerably more than our share. Until quite recently no other Church seemed to be ready to act in this capacity, and our men were almost the only ones to respond. It now seems probable that the Army may decide to take over the whole hospital chaplaincy service, putting the men under Army commissions, and until this point is decided, recruiting for the Red Cross Hospital Chaplain service will be suspended. Application to go as chaplains in the Army should be made through the Bishop of Washington, and we will be entitled to our quota of the new chaplains and must supply them. Of course all men enlisting as Army chaplains must be ready to serve for the duration of the war, and must comply with all Army requirements.

In regard to the whole subject of our clergy who desire to go abroad, I do not wish to seem presumptuous in speaking to my brothers, either of the Episcopate or of the Priesthood, but I may be allowed to make one or two suggestions, founded, as I have said, on experience and observation. It would hardly seem to me worth while for any Bishop who is in active charge of a diocese to go overseas except in some directly representative and administrative capacity. The Army does not know exactly how to place or how to treat an itinerant Bishop serving in an apparently non-Episcopal position. Nor in my judgment would the position of Y. M. C. A. Secretary or Base Hospital Chaplain, either of which positions could as well be filled by a Priest, appear quite to justify a Bishop in suspending for any considerable period the exercise of his Episcopal office in his own diocese. I submit this with all deference, merely as my own opinion and without any criticism of any of my brothers who have come to a different conclusion, but I should be surprised if after actual experience their opinion did not agree with mine. When Bishops come over in strange and unfamiliar relations, the Army might be pardoned for saying, "Bishops we know, and Chaplains we know, but who are ye?"

As to the other clergy, the question would have to be decided in each case on its merits. Quite naturally we all want to go, and going, we all want to be at the front. But no man should go merely for the sake of going. Of course, we must keep up the supply of chaplains, and we must be ready instantly and adequately to meet any other demand for the ministrations of religion. But it does not seem to me that it is necessary for a clergyman to undertake to do work that can just as well be done by a layman, if in so doing he suspends his own proper function and ceases to act ministerially. If the war goes on, as it seems likely to do, there will be urgent need, whether over here or over there, for every ordained Priest of the Church to function as such in the cure of souls, be that cure with the Army abroad or at home, or with the people of his own Parish who are back of the fighting men and supporting the fighting men. If the number of troops rises towards the five million objective there will be a corresponding rise in the number of chaplains required for the Army and in the ever-expanding Navy. This increase we must meet, and we must correspondingly provide for filling vacancies in the regular parochial work and in the mission field.

Before closing I wish to bear witness to the loyalty, the bravery, the devotion and the quiet, modest usefulness of our clergy now serving abroad. Chaplain Danker, who has given his life, is but one of many, both in the regimental and in the hospital service, of whom the Church at home has reason to be proud. Let us remember them in our prayers and let us hold up their hands in their awful and glorious task. As to what is for each of us his own duty, we must try to keep a proper sense of values, fearlessly to analyze our own motives and to give just appreciation to advice and authority. Above all things, we must seek by prayer, obedience and self-sacrifice to find out what is the all-conclusive Will of God.

THE AMERICAN CHURCH IN PARIS: ITS MEANING AND NECESSITIES.

In an article under this title, to which reference was made in our issue last week, the Rev. Dr. Samuel N. Watson, Rector Emeritus of this Church, explains why the Church is in very serious financial straits at this time and appeals to American friends to come to its support. The splendid patriotic and charitable work which has been done for four years in connection with this parish, of which some account has been given, makes his account of the Church more interesting and his plea more pointed.

The present building was built in 1884, the Parish House a little before that date, and the rectory was completed in 1913; the whole of the real property representing an expenditure of a million and a quarter of dollars; and it could not be reproduced to-day for twice that sum. It is the representative American building on the continent of Europe, this beautiful, Cathedral-like church, and every American may be proud of it. Thirty thousand American travelers used to pass through its doors every year in the old days, and its mortuary chapel has been the inn which has housed temporarily the bodies of more than eight hundred Americans of every religious confession; and for the living or the dead, the hospitalities of that church in the Avenue de l'Alma were freely offered; and many are those who remember its grateful shelter when their hearts were heavy and they needed a place of rest.

The normal expenditures of such a Church, ministering not only to the more or less fixed "American Colony" in Paris but to the great multitudes of transient visitors who composed the larger part of its congregation, were, of course, very large. Changing conditions had made its support difficult even before the war. Its income was derived from pew rents, from the offerings at public worship, and the gifts of generous friends who knew its value. Before the war there was a long waiting list for desirable sittings; now two-thirds of them have had to be given up, their former holders being no longer there. The offerings are less than half what they used to be; and Americans are no longer traveling abroad for pleasure and with money to bestow. Expenses have been cut down to the lowest, but under the circumstances a growing deficit is inevitable without generous aid from this country. For the rest, let Dr. Watson speak for himself.

The Church must be in Paris after the war, and there will be an American colony again in Paris, but it will not be the colony of other days to whom the Church was endeared by manifold association; rather, it will be a new people amongst whom the Church must create her clientele—the old are gone; the old ties are broken. And again, a new colony like to the old will not build itself up again in Paris after the war because life is different everywhere, and life will be more than different there. There will be throngs of sightseers in Paris; there will be hosts of people on business errands of one kind and another, there will be thousands upon thousands of students there who once went to other places in Europe, and the Church will be infinitely needed; it may be needed more than ever; but the building up of a colony of retired, conservative, well-to-do gentle people, such as was that older other colony, that will not be. They came there in other days to seek a well-earned ease where life was gentle and manners gay; they brought their families with them; travel was not easy; they stayed in Paris long enough to acquire the taste for Paris, for one must learn to really love Paris. There were no automobiles, and after a time, staying was easier than going, and they stayed and became part of a permanent life. But life does not move by such a measured pace nowadays, and it is easier to flit than to stay, and the restless fit is on us all; and again, the same class of people will not come.

But as was said, the Church must be there. It is infinitely worth while that the Church should be there today, ministered to by our own clergymen called there for service, and where the congregation, now that the civilians are gone, is almost all in uniform. But it will even more than ever be needed, more than ever worth while, this American Church in Europe, and above all, in Paris, after the war—after the war when the reconstruction work commences. For reconstruction work "over there" is not going to stop with houses and villages and men's and women's ways of gaining a livelihood; there is a reconstruction of outward methods of the expression of an inward faith which is coming at the same time—indeed, it has long since begun, and the war is, and has been, a potent factor in clearing men's vision as to non-essentials and of riveting their attention to the essentials.

God did not save this Church of ours with its unique heritage of the simplicity of the faith and the fullest Christian liberty combined with a wholesome reverence for the past and a dignity in outward expression free from superstition, for no real purpose. We have a mission, as the Church of the Reconciliation, if we will live up to our opportunity. And it is in France that the problem of Christian reconciliation is seen in its simplest terms, because in France there are really but two categories of Christians, French Catholics and French Protestants, and the issue is not confused by hundreds of sects as it is here in America. There also religion partakes more of the character of a national expression than it does here, or can; in France patriotism tinctures all with its own glowing hue. They are French Catholics and French Protestants, and for France's sake they want to understand each other; they want to find some common medium of expression.

You must have lived amongst them intimately to realize all the meaning of it; you must have known what the strivings of scholarly men like Fonsegrive were for, and others like him, who were trying so beautifully to interpret the soul of France to herself; you must have talked with the cure, and the pastor in the country villages, and with the peasants by the roadside; and, above all, you must have so been part of their life and so comprehensively use their language and their tongue that they will know that you know them and will give you their confidence, so that there will be said to you as was said more than once to the present Rector Emeritus of Paris by representatives of the strongest religious faiths of France, "Monsieur, nothing could be such a blessing to France as to have in her life something which corresponds to your American Church of the Avenue de l'Alma; a worship rendered in the language of the people, with dignity and with beauty and with reverence, yet all of it inspired with the free spirit of a free people. We do not have it in France, any of us, either Catholic or Protestant; yet, it is only so that the Catholic and Protestant can speak in common terms."

But outward evidence of the same longing is open to all. The leading Revue of its class in France is the Revue Hebdomadaire; its editor is Fernand Laudet. It recently contained an article by Julien de Narfon, and Fernand Laudet and Julien de Narfon were colleagues as the secretaries of the last French legation to the Vatican while France was still represented at Rome. Fernand Laudet publishes in the Revue an article which Julien de Narfon writes, and in this article, four pages are given to the explaining of just what this American Church of ours is; to the end that this also might be said, "Evidently Rome cannot speak to Protestantism directly, but we have, occupying a median position between the two and stretching her hands in both directions, the American Episcopal Church. Let us serve ourselves of this intermediary."

It is not a chimera, this faith of ours, that there shall be a Church of the Reconciliation. Rome has seen the meaning of its coming. "Family of Nations" is the watchword of civic peace and mutual understanding between peoples; it shall not be that the State outdistance the Church in a real progress toward brotherhood; toward peace amongst men on the earth; and in preparing its coming, this Church of ours may have a very real part, if we will. Toward this end there is no more necessary impulse than the placing on a basis of fullest vitality and efficiency, our American Church in Paris. It must be made possible that this Church and its ministers be given the power to represent in France and to the French people, and to other peoples—for France and Paris will be the Mecca to which their eyes will turn—the largeness of the vision of our American concept of Christianity; and to so interpret it as to show in a manner they cannot mistake, our sympathy and our intelligent understanding of that intensely vital religious faith which is ever burning on the altar of the soul of France. If we miss the seizing of this opportunity in the largest possible way, we will be defaulting of our most blessed heritage. We have not our freedom as a gift for ourselves, but rather, if we would keep it, as a trust for others.

The Rector Emeritus of the Church in Paris will be in America for some months at least. The date of his return to Paris is undetermined and will depend largely on two things: the obtaining of the necessary rest and renewed strength to take up the work there again, and also the obtaining of an assurance of ample financial support for the Church and for the large French and Belgian relief work which was created by himself and Mrs. Watson when the war began, and which they are still carrying on by the help of groups of French and Belgian colleagues with whom they have worked from the beginning. Dr. Watson will be glad to give any added information needed to persons interested in the causes he represents here, and he makes an earnest appeal to all who believe in these causes, to make early and definite response, for the needs of the Church in Paris are immediate.

Dr. Watson may be addressed either care of the Church Mission House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City; or care of the National City Bank, Akron, Ohio.

A BETTER SYSTEM.

By the Rev. D. A. Sanford, a Missionary in New Mexico.

VIII. Changed Modern Conditions and Their Effect.

If, fifty years ago, our present parish system was satisfactory, why not the same today? The answer is that modern conditions have made great changes. Business life, farm life and much else have changed, and these changes affect the Church also. Take farm life, which largely affects the Church in the country and in the smaller towns.

Sixty years ago farm work was largely done by hand, now it is done by machinery. Farmers in Wisconsin and other timber regions plowed with oxen between the stumps. They sowed the grain by hand. They cut the wheat with a cradle and bound it by hand. In those days the spinning wheel and the tallow candle were in use in the house. School was kept for only a few months in the year, but the little log school-house was generally well filled. On Sundays the farmer hitched his oxen to the heavy wagon and took his family to church service, where generally the little church or school-house was filled.

Now see the changes. The little farm of forty or eighty acres has been sold and added to the farm of a neighbor. Modern machinery has come, and there is not the need of so many hands to do the farm work. The sewing machine, the telephone, the piano and much else have come into the farmer's house. Larger and finer school-houses and church buildings have been erected. Railroads have been built and wagon roads improved. The children and grandchildren of farmers, who sixty years ago rode after ox teams, now ride to church in an automobile.

Many, however, of the younger people have moved from the farm or the country town to the large city, and when they go to church they help to swell the congregation in some large parish. The little parish in a small town has often grown weaker, or with a great struggle has barely maintained itself and remained at a standstill, while the parish in a large city has grown stronger. Modern conditions have made great changes in our churches. The weak have often grown weaker and the strong have grown stronger.

Take other localities, where large numbers are employed in cotton or woolen mills and in factories, and where foreigners have taken the place of our American people. Take also the mining communities, with foreigners of many races and languages. How, under these changed conditions, shall the Church do her work? Many who are dealing with these problems feel that the parish system of fifty years ago is not satisfactory in meeting present modern conditions.
